PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

THIRD SESSION OF THE TWENTY-SIXTH PARLIAMENT OF

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, 7th May 1897.

TRUSTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee (according to Order): Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

LAND TRANSFER BILL [H.L.]

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL.

Read 2ª, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

THE EARL OF MORLEY (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) asked Her Majesty's Government what arrangements it was proposed to make for distributing to Peers and officers of the House tickets to witness the procession on June 22?

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE (LORD STEWARD): I am informed by the First Commissioner of Works that the Lord Great Chamberlain has undertaken the distribution of tickets for the official stand for the use of Peers desiring to view the Royal Procession. Application for seats should be sent to the Lord Great Chamberlain's Secretary. The stand will be placed in front of the National Gallery, and I have no doubt that the Lord Great Chamberlain will adopt the suggestion of the noble Earl as to provision being made for the officers of the House.

THE EARL OF ANCASTER (LORD GREAT CHAMBERLAIN): I propose to send out a letter to every Peer stating that one ticket will be provided free of charge, and that two more can be obtained at the price of 12s. 6d. each.

House Adjourned at Twenty-five Minutes before Five o'Clock, to Monday next, a Quarter before Eleven o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 7th May 1897.

QUESTIONS.

MODEL SCHOOLS (IRELAND).

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) does the Inquiry into the model schools cover the question of the greater expenditure per head on the pupils of these schools as compared with those in other national schools; if not, what is the explanation of this discrepancy; (2) could he give the percentage of passes under the two systems as a whole, or any other basis of comparison between them, as to educational results, and the percentage of passes in one or two of the best model schools and one or two of the best convent national schools; and (3) when will the evidence and Report be ready for presentation to Parliament?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. Of the total number of pupils examined in the year 1895, in ordinary national schools, model schools, and convent and monastery national schools, the percentage of passes was 80·7, 88·7, and 91·8 respectively. It would be invidious to select individual schools for purposes of comparison. It is not possible at present to fix a date for the completion of the documents referred to in the last paragraph, as the Inquiry is still in progress, and may continue for some time longer. I think it would be desirable to take the opinion of the Commissioners before promising that the evidence and Report will be laid on the Table.

EVICTION (CO. LONGFORD).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland can he state the circumstances under which the eviction of Eliza Quinn, of Prucklish, County Longford, was carried out; whether the tenancy was then vested in her son-in-law, without the usual terms of redemption being allowed; and, whether this person is now the statutory tenant, and in that capacity is he receiving police protection?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Mrs. Quinn was evicted on the 21st January last for non-payment of three and a half years' rent and costs. The notice under Section 7 of the Land Act of 1887 was served on the 3rd June, 1896, so that the tenant had ample time to redeem in the seven months intervening prior to her eviction. On the day following her eviction, her son-in-law got possession of the holding, of which he is now the statutory tenant. No special arrangements have been made by the police for his protection.

LONGFORD CANAL HARBOUR.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will direct a Board of Trade Inquiry into the circumstances under which Michael M'Nally lost his life in the canal harbour at Longford, with a view to fixing the blame on the proper shoulders for the unprotected state of the harbour?

The HON. MEMBER further asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he will made good his promise in the early part of this Session to favourably consider any Bill which would enable local authorities or canal companies to enclose those parts of their basins or canals in which human life has been frequently lost; whether he is aware that the canal harbour at Longford comes within this category, and that there has been a man drowned there so lately as 28th March last; whether he will examine the Canals and Navigable Rivers Bill, at present before the House, with a view to the adoption of some scheme to compel the inclosure of this dangerous basin?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): answer the hon. Member's questions together. The Board of Trade have no power to order such an Inquiry as that desired, and as it is a case which obviously falls under the jurisdiction of the Coroner, there should be no difficulty in fixing the blame on the proper shoulders. With respect to that portion of the hon.

Gentleman's Question referring to proposed legislation, I think if the hon. Gentleman will refer to my previous answers, he will find I gave no such promise as he indicates. Any legislation of such a nature, if desirable, should in my opinion not be limited to Ireland. If the Bill referred to comes on for consideration in the House, I will carefully consider the arguments urged in its favour.

SCOTS GREYS.

Mr. J. H. C. HOZIER (Lanark, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that the standard of height for the Royal Scots Greys has been reduced by two inches; and, if so, for what cavalry regiments recruits between 5 feet 9 inches and 5 feet 11 inches in height can now be enlisted?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for WAR (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): There is a difficulty in mounting heavy men abroad, while, on the other hand, tall recruits are required for the Foot Guards and for artillery gunners. Therefore, during the last few years the standard for Line cavalry regiments has been gradually reduced, and recruits are not taken above 5ft. 9in. in height. When the Scots Greys and the Royals were recently brought on the foreign service roster, their standard was reduced accordingly. As men are not taken for the Household Cavalry under 5 ft. 11 in. there is no cavalry opening for men between that height and 5 ft. 9 in.

Mr. HOZIER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a recruit who has enlisted, or may enlist, specially for the Royal Scots Greys will, under the new scheme, be liable, during the term of his service, to be transferred against his wish to any other dragoon regiment?

Mr. BRODRICK: Recruits have been enlisted since 1893 for the Corps of Dragoons, and are liable to be called upon to serve in any regiment of that corps. A man who enlisted previously for the Scots Greys cannot be transferred against his wish.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS ACT.

Mr. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the grants due to schools whose school year ended on or before the 31st March last, but not paid till after the passing of the Voluntary Schools Act, are liable to deduction under what is commonly known as the 17s. 6d. limit; and whether any deduction under that limit will be made in grants paid to schools on account of school years ending between 31st March 1897 and 31st March 1898?

The VICE PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL (Sir John Gorst, Cambridge University): The 17s. 6d. limit will cease to affect the grants payable to schools whose school years end on or after March 31, 1897.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

Mr. ERNEST GRAY: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, assuming that Section 97 of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, be amended as from the 29th day of September 1897, the grants paid to necessitous School Boards after that date on the average attendance for the year ending 29th September 1897 will be subject to the new conditions as set out in the amending Bill?

Sir J. GORST: Yes, Sir.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, on what basis the additional good conduct stripes for postmen, recommended by the Tweedmouth Committee, will be distributed; is it the case that a man with 30 years' unblemished record already possessing three stripes, the maximum number formerly granted, will only receive one additional stripe forthwith instead of three as recommended by the Committee, and will thus be no better off than a man with 20 years' service; will a postman of 30 years' service have to serve another 10 years before he is entitled to his sixth stripe; and will the auxiliary and substituting service performed prior to the 1st April 1897 be taken into account in awarding stripes?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The additional good conduct stripes will be awarded on the following basis: A man already in possession of three good conduct stripes will receive at once an additional good conduct stripe for every five years' unblemished service since the date of the last award. Thus a man who since he received his third stripe has five years good service will receive one stripe; 10 years' good service two stripes; or 15 years' good service three stripes. Auxiliary service will be taken into account as regards the award of good conduct stripes to men who have none. Two years' good service in an auxiliary capacity will be reckoned as one year toward stripes. As regards what is known as substituting service, it is as a rule intermittent and not continuous. Intermittent service would not count for stripes.

MR. STUART: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what will be the total saving that will ultimately be effected by the abolition of the allowances paid to provincial postmen in lieu of Christmas boxes and for special duties, also by the abolition of the allowances at present paid to the London sorting staff?

MR. HANBURY: None of the allowances to provincial postmen can be properly described as allowances in lieu of Christmas boxes, seeing that they are in all cases assigned to special duties, and they will be continued to present recipients so long as the special duties are performed by them. It is estimated that the total saving ultimately to be effected by the gradual abolition of the allowances will amount in the case of the provincial postmen to £29,000 a year and in the case of the London sorters to £10,500 a year. But it is calculated that the higher salaries to be paid will much more than counterbalance this saving in allowances.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): May I ask whether people are prohibited from giving Christmas boxes to postmen if they choose to continue the practice?

MR. HANBURY: Oh, no, Sir; the prohibition is only directed against the solicitation by postmen. There is no reason whatever why people should not give them Christmas boxes if they choose to do so.

SIR H. FOWLER: I asked the Question because I thought it desirable that if that were the case it should be known. ["Hear, hear!"]

WATER SUPPLY (URSWICK).

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the defective water supply of the villages of Much and Little Urswick; whether there has been a Local Government Board Inquiry which disclosed defects in the water supply; and whether he can take any steps to remedy the same?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The Local Government Board have been satisfied, as the result of local inquiries by their inspectors, that the villages of Great and Little Urswick are in need of a proper water supply. The villages, however, though forming part of the Ulverstone Rural District, are within the limits of supply of the Ulverstone Urban District Council. This and other exceptional features of the case have appeared to the Board to render it difficult for them to take compulsory action against the Rural Council. The Board, however, have urged the Rural Council to negotiate with the Urban Council for the necessary supply; and the Councils have been in communication on the subject. But the Board understand that there is objection by owners and ratepayers to the expenses, and apparently the Rural District Council are not taking further action in the matter.

TRANSVAAL (JAMESON RAID).

MR. THOMAS BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any reply has been made to the Note of the Transvaal Government of 16th February, enclosing bill of indemnity to be paid or to be caused to be paid by Her Majesty's Government for the raid made by Dr. Jameson and the British South African Company's troops; and, if so, what was the reply?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Correspondence is proceeding on the subject, but I am not likely to be in a position to make any statement to the House for some time.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Mr. J. W. MACLURE (Lancashire, Stretford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will instruct the officials at Somerset House not to claim any extra Income Tax or other taxes from permanent residents in London or in the country generally for seats let by them on the occasion of the joyous celebration of Her Most Gracious Majesty's 60 years' reign?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bristol, W.): I cannot instruct the Inland Revenue authorities to abstain from claiming from a particular class of taxpayers any duties which may be legally due from them.

Mr. HARRY FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if any provision has been made in the proposed erection of stands on the occasion of Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee for the commissioned officers of the Army, including veteran officers who served in the Crimea and the Indian Mutiny?

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Akers-Douglas, Kent, St. Augustine's): Stands will be erected on the occasion of Her Majesty's Jubilee for officers both of the Army and Navy. The distribution of tickets will be in the hands of the War Office and Admiralty respectively.

Captain PHILLPOTTS (Devon, Torquay): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is intended that Her Majesty's Naval and Marine Forces should be represented on the occasion of the Jubilee celebrations by detachments from those forces forming part of the procession to and from St. Paul's Cathedral?

The FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): It has been settled, as I understand, that the procession on the day of the Jubilee celebration is to be confined exclusively to mounted men, so that the Bluejackets and Marines who will represent the Navy on the occasion will not be included in the actual procession; but, as the Bluejackets will be distributed over different parts of the route, and will be marched to their stations along the route in strong contingents, as much opportunity as possible will be given to the spectators to see them march past.

STRABANE EQUITY SESSIONS.

Mr. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to a case at the Strabane Equity Sessions on Friday, 9th April, where a civil bill officer, named Thomas K. Howe, brought an action against Mrs. Margaret Murphy, a widow, to compel specific performance of an agreement for the sale of a farm at a place called Woodend; is he aware that it was disclosed in evidence that the bailiff Howe, accompanied by a clerk, took to the defendant an agreement ready drawn, which he compelled her to sign, although she begged for time to consult her solicitor; and that the Judge, Sir Francis Brady, Q.C., in dismissing the case with costs, stated that Howe had taken the defendant at a disadvantage, and had refused to allow her to have legal advice; and also that the solicitor had not taken a wise course in acting in the case for both parties; and will he call the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the conduct of Mr. Howe as a civil bill officer?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Civil bill officers are under the control, not of the Lord Chancellor, but of the County Court Judges. A copy of the Question of the hon. Member has been referred to the learned Judge, Sir Francis Brady.

CONGESTED DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND).

Mr. JAMES E. B. BAILLIE (Inverness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when the Bill dealing with the Government proposals regarding the congested districts in the Highlands will be presented to the House?

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): I regret I cannot at present name a date for the introduction of the Bill dealing with the congested districts of the Highlands.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (ENGLAND).

Sir CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether female sub-inspectors are employed under the English Education Department; and, if so, how many are thus employed?

Sir J. GORST: Yes, Sir; two.

WATERFORD, DUNGARVAN AND LISMORE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in view of a promise he made to a deputation of ratepayers who waited on him last week, when he will be in a position to inform the ratepayers of the county and city of Waterford, who are paying £14,000 a year to the Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore Railway Company, what action the Government propose to take with regard to that Company; and whether the scheme which the Treasury stated they were considering, and which they promised would be submitted to the ratepayers before being adopted, will be made known before the Vote for the Board of Works is taken?

Mr. HANBURY: I have already informed a deputation, of which the hon. Gentleman was a member, that before any arrangement was finally completed I would make public what our general proposal was, and postpone the Board of Works Vote in order to afford an opportunity for its discussion, if necessary. The decision must, of course, rest with the Treasury and the House of Commons, though the interest of the ratepayers and others concerned will be fully borne in mind. I must repeat, however, what I stated to the deputation—that the locality served by the line is not in the same position as a congested district.

Mr. P. J. POWER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is the fact, as reported in the Welsh papers, that the Midland Railway Company of England are negotiating for the purchase of this line; and I wish further to ask him, in connection with his reply, how he will arrange to take the opinion of the people concerned on this matter?

Mr. HANBURY: I made no promise to take the opinion of the ratepayers. I only said that they should be informed before the decision was arrived at.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY OF IRELAND.

Mr. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the footbridge so long promised to be erected by the Great Northern Railway Company at Castleblaney has not been commenced yet; whether he is aware that the Great Northern Railway Company at Castleblaney shunt trains over this level crossing, and that the public are greatly inconvenienced and delayed by the railway gates being closed several times a day while trains are crossing and shunting going on; and whether he can state what course he intends to take in this matter, or when will this long promised bridge be erected?

Mr. RITCHIE: The Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland inform the Board of Trade that the plans for a footbridge are now completed, and that tenders for carrying out the work will be invited immediately.

LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. DALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a great many applications by farmers from the vicinity of Castleblaney to have fair rents fixed on their holdings has been made to the Irish Land Commissioners before November last, and that many of these farms have not yet been viewed by the Sub-Commissioners, and whether he can say when these farms will be inspected and decisions given?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners inform me that it has not yet been possible for the Sub-Commission to hear all the cases on the present Castleblaney list, but that they will be dealt with as rapidly as possible.

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that no Land Commission has sat in the county Sligo for the past six months, and whether he can say how many cases are now awaiting hearing in that county, and when the Commission will visit Sligo?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: A Sub-Commission sat for the disposal of cases in the county of Sligo in October last.

A further Sub-Commission will commence the hearing of cases from the unions of Sligo, Tubbercurry and Boyle on the 14th instant. There are 329 cases in the county Sligo which have not yet been listed for hearing.

WRECK (SS. "MEMPHIS").

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, since the recent wreck of the ss. Memphis on the Mizen Head, the question has been revived of establishing a fog signal on the Three Castles' Head; whether the Irish Light Commissioners have stated that such a fog signal would encourage vessels into danger; whether he is aware that the Liverpool Underwriters' Association and the Liverpool Steamship Owners' Association, numbering among its members all the large liners trading between Liverpool and America, and carrying a very great number of emigrants and other passengers, are very strongly of opinion that the establishment of such a fog signal would be of very material assistance in the safe navigation of those waters, especially in regard to vessels which in thick weather have got out of their course, and whether he can arrange that this strong request of those who at present contribute so largely to the cost of fog signal stations shall be carried into effect?

MR. RITCHIE: Representations have lately been made as to the desirability of establishing a fog signal on the Three Castles' Head, and I am informed that the Commissioners of Irish Lights have stated, in reply to such representations, that, in their opinion, the effect of such a fog signal would be to encourage vessels into danger. The Board of Trade have no statutory power to take the initiative in establishing fog signal stations.

NAVY (PULMONARY DISEASES).

CAPTAIN PHILLPOTTS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, out of a batch of 80 men surveyed at Haslar Hospital and found unfit for further service in Her Majesty's Navy, the majority were young stokers with less than six months' service, who were incapacitated by pulmonary complaints; and if the Government have any plan to check the development of such diseases among this class?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY: I have seen a statement to the effect of the hon. and gallant Member's Question, but it is entirely incorrect, and I regret its publication, as tending to create apprehensions for which there is no foundation. The statement suggests that, out of 80 men surveyed, the majority were young stokers with less than six months' service, incapacitated by pulmonary complaints. As a matter of fact, out of 76 men and boys who were invalided at Haslar last month on the occasion in question, only 18 were stokers, and of these, both young and old, only eight were found unfit on account of pulmonary disease. Of these eight, five were 22 years of age and upwards.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS BILL.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, before proceeding further with the Metropolitan Police Courts Bill, he will lay upon the Table a statement showing the scale of salaries which, in the event of the Bill being passed into law, he proposes to establish for the clerks of the said Courts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley): The salaries of the Police Court Clerks formed the subject of a special Inquiry three years ago by the Consultative Committee established under the Order in Council of August, 1890, who recommended that the scale for second Clerks should be £100, rising to £350 by increments of £10 for the first six years, and of £15 afterwards, and for chief clerks £400, rising by £15 first and £20 afterwards to £600. The clerks, on the other hand, will not receive the profits arising from the sale of depositions, which will be paid to the Receiver. These recommendations were adopted by the Secretary of State.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, following the precedent set by his predecessor in 1874 on the occasion of an engagement then given to Parliament as to contributions to local rates in respect of Government property, he will embody in a Treasury Minute (and lay a copy thereof upon the Table) the engagement given in connection with the Metropolitan Police Courts Bill now before this House, that the Treasury will contribute to the Metropolitan Police Fund an annual sum of £7,000 in consideration of the services rendered by the Police to the Houses of Parliament?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I quite agree with the hon. Member that there should be some public record of the engagement to which he refers. I think that the best course will be for the Treasury and the Home Office to exchange letters on the subject and that the letters should be laid before Parliament.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to his statement that a debt of £8,000 is due to the Treasury by the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police in respect of the fabric of the Bow Street Police Court, will he say when and under what circumstances was this expenditure incurred; when was the claim to repayment first made; and has the Receiver of Metropolitan Police admitted the claim; and, if so, when, and in what form?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The debt is in respect of the police station at Bow Street, not the Court. The station was built in 1881 by the Office of Works, and the cost, which was met in the first instance out of moneys voted by Parliament, is being repaid to the Treasury by instalments.

TREASON-FELONY PRISONERS (IRELAND).

MR. J. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received a copy of a Resolution adopted by the Legislative Council of Cape Colony, praying that Her Majesty's Government would see its way clear to advise Her Majesty to exercise her clemency towards certain prisoners undergoing punishment in connection with questions affecting the political condition of Ireland; and whether he has sent any, and, if so what, reply to that Resolution?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I received last year a Resolution adopted by the Legislative Council of the Cape Colony, in which the release of the Reform prisoners by the Government of the South African Republic was referred to, and a hope was expressed that like clemency would be extended by Her Majesty's Government towards prisoners undergoing punishment for similar offences in connection with questions affecting the political condition of Ireland. I replied that I was unable to admit that the offences of which the prisoners in this country referred to were guilty, and which included attempts at assassination and projected outrages endangering the lives of men, women and children in no way responsible for political action, bore any resemblance to the purely political offences charged against the members of the Johannesburg Reform Committee. [Cheers.]

FALKLAND ISLANDS.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Governor of the Falkland Islands has forwarded a Dispatch to the Colonial Office urging the Government to abolish the office of Colonial Surgeon in the Falkland Islands and to establish in substitution thereof two official medical posts; whether the Hon. Samuel Hamilton, a member of the Legislative Council, who has filled for the last 18 years the post of Colonial Surgeon in the Falkland Islands, has forwarded a memorial to the Colonial Secretary in which he has stated his views, which are directly opposed to the recommendation of the Government; whether he has yet arrived at a decision on the matter; and whether, having regard to the length of Dr. Hamilton's service and efficient discharge of his duties as Colonial Surgeon, care will be taken in the event of any alteration in the medical establishment of the Falkland Islands to safeguard his interests, and to secure him full compensation for any loss such alteration may entail?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: No such Dispatch has reached me, nor has the matter been under my consideration.

TRANSVAAL (IMMIGRATION LAW).

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies a Question of which I have given him private notice—whether it is true, as stated in the newspapers, that the Volksraad have repealed the Immigration Law, and whether this action is taken in accordance with a letter sent to the Volksraad by the South African Government themselves.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen the statements in the newspapers and I have no reason to disbelieve them. At the same time I have not received official confirmation, but I need hardly add that if the statements should turn out to be true it will greatly relieve the tension which has existed, unfortunately, between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Transvaal. [Cheers.]

POOR LAW RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. T. M. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary whether, after what took place the previous evening, he would attempt to proceed on Monday with the Poor Law Relief (Ireland) Bill, or whether he would hold it over for further consideration?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I do not see why it should not be proceeded with in consequence of what happened last night. I hope it will be reached in sufficient time to allow of ample discussion.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give proper facilities for its discussion?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I understand that the principle of the Bill is generally accepted.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: It raises the whole question of rating and control.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (MORNING SITTINGS).

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I beg to give notice, on behalf of the Leader of the House, that on Monday he proposes to move that morning sittings be taken on Tuesdays.

Captain BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): What business will be taken on Tuesday?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I cannot state now, but very likely it will be the Budget Resolutions.

MINING ACCIDENT (DURHAM).

Mr. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) asked for information as to the mining accident in Durham.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS said that when he left the Home Office there was no information then. He had sent since to ascertain whether information had arrived, and he expected to receive it every minute.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

[SEVENTH ALLOTTED DAY.]

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1897-8.

Class II.—Crete.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

> "That a sum, not exceeding £49,705, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs."

Mr. ROBSON (South Shields) moved

> "That Item A (Salaries), be reduced by £500, in respect of the salary of the Secretary of State."

He said that when the Eastern Question was last before the House hon. Members were asked to wait patiently while the Government pursued a policy which the First Lord of the Treasury described as one of peace in Europe and freedom in Crete. That policy up to the present had brought us to war in Europe and anarchy in Crete. There were many hon. Members on both sides of the House who, in listening to that phrase, reflected that it perhaps expressed the Prime Minister's aspiration rather than his policy. In every quarter of the globe when the present Foreign Secretary had to face a strong Power he had shown always the same unvarying weakness; and it was scarcely to be expected that he would be likely to change his political character in a crisis like this, which needed courage as the first essential of any policy. British interests had been surrendered without a blow, almost without a word, in Siam and Madagascar, and more important than all, in Eastern Asia. They had seen arbitration refused to Venezuela and then granted in consequence of a menace which he thought was without a parallel in the history of our diplomacy. They were not surprised, with these events in their recollection, that the Prime Minister should have betaken himself to the European Concert, for just as the isolation of England, which he had done so much to promote, was his excuse for a policy of surrender, so he found in the European Concert an excellent cover and excuse for a policy of drift. [Cheers.] No one had explained better than the Prime Minister what the proper view of the European Concert was. To listen to the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs one would suppose the European Concert was a new device for which this Government was entitled to claim the credit. It was, however, a very old device. There was always a Concert of Europe for the oppression of the smaller Powers. This was what the Prime Minister said of the European Concert in 1878 as to the Treaty of Paris, which now apparently was the corner-stone of English policy:—

> "I am not alarmed even by the condemnation passed on it by the noble Lord (Ripon) when he declares that we have departed from the European Concert. What will the future historian think of the European Concert when he comes to record what that Concert has promised and what it has performed? The European Concert of 1856 was to preserve the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire, and certainly a more imposing machinery could not be devised. But 20 years have passed. . . . . Not one member of the European Concert has lifted its hand in defence of the integrity of the Turkish Empire. . . . . I think it is better that we should come to a simpler form of engagement in which, only two Powers being mixed up, there can be no doubt as to the pledges being fulfilled."

The European Concert was then on the side of liberty, but the moment it ranged itself against liberty then they had the Prime Minister availing himself of its shelter in order to excuse his policy. [Cheers.] It would be said that this European Concert had procured at least the promises of great reforms. It was on those reforms, which had gone to the extent of autonomy, that the Government relied for their excuse in subordinating the influence of England and in lending the Navy of England to the great Powers of Europe. The Government put forward the projected reforms and their scheme of autonomy as their excuse for a policy which had had the effect of strengthening Turkey and Russia, and of destroying the Power which, beyond any other Power in Eastern Europe, the English people desired to see maintained and extended. But the reforms and the autonomy of which the Government made so much were futile—he might go further and dub them a deliberate sham. Whenever a promise of reforms was obtained from the Turks, one question was always carefully shirked by the diplomatists—namely, the question of expense and the payment of the soldiery or new gendarmerie. The result was that the promised constitution was left in suspense, and probably fresh massacres occurred. What had occurred in Crete was quite in accordance with all previous experience. Twelve months after Lord Salisbury had obtained from the Sultan a promise of reforms in Armenia, he declared in the House of Lords:—

> "Until the finance of the Porte is brought to a satisfactory state we cannot expect any bonâ fide reforms. Nothing costs money like administrative reform."

It was this question of expense which the British Government and the Concert of Europe had again failed to face; and, that being so, Crete and Greece knew—and he ventured to add Lord Salisbury also—that the promised reforms were absolutely illusory, and the war became obviously inevitable. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs had lauded the proposed autonomy as an advance on all previous promises made by the Porte. It had, however, been shown that this autonomy could not be a cure for Cretan difficulties, because the islanders refused it 20 years ago. It was, in fact, a stale and exhausted device. As a matter of fact Crete had already in appearance a far better constitution than we had. There was a general assembly which met every year, and which was elected by the whole population. The imposts and duties were carefully limited, and the expenditure was under popular control. There was a Christian governor for every Christian district, assisted by a Christian council; and there was a Mussulman governor for every Mussulman district, with whom was associated a Christian deputy governor as coadjutor. There was a gendarmerie, supposed to be recruited from Christians and Mussulmans indifferently, and finally, this great theoretical constitution was safeguarded by the most absolute liberty of the Press. Before offering Crete new conditions it ought to have occurred to the Government—as it would have to any mere practical man—to ask why a constitution so ample and perfect in theory had been a ridiculous and disastrous failure. The answer was supplied by the presence of the Turkish troops in the island. ["Hear, hear!"] As long as they were there there must, of course, be a military commander who acted as military governor. The troops had to be paid, and did the Government imagine that the Sultan was likely to send them money from his not overflowing Treasury, upon which there were so many demands, political and domestic? [Laughter.] Why had not the Government told the people of Crete how this important financial question was to be settled? Why had they not said that under their scheme the Cretans would not be called upon to pay tribute to the Sultan? It was not likely that autonomous Cretans were going to collect money to send to Constantinople. This financial question had been disregarded, but it must be settled or the proffered autonomy would remain a palpable sham. The Cretans were fighting for three things which were not met by the proposals of the Powers. They demanded the expulsion of the Turkish troops—["hear, hear!"]—the right to arm and form themselves into a national militia, and freedom from Turkish tribute and taxes. The Powers, by insisting on the maintenance of the Turkish troops in the island, had practically refused to grant those demands, and that was the cause of the present difficulty. With regard to Armenia, according to the admission of the Prime Minister himself, England could do nothing alone. It seemed to be the Prime Minister's glory to have brought his country in relation to the Armenian question into a sort of moral bankruptcy. ["Hear, hear!"] The obligation was there, but the power to fulfil it did not exist. But if that was the case with Armenia, no one could say that it was the case with Crete. ["Hear, hear!"] Not only were we under an obligation there, but we possessed the power to fulfil it. With regard to Armenia, it was said that we could not send our Fleet over the mountains into Asia Minor; but we were masters of the Mediterranean. What, then, was lacking but the courage? ["Hear, hear!"] Why was the complete expulsion of the Turkish troops not demanded by the Concert of Europe? It was said that it was not demanded because one of the Powers imposed its veto. Which of the Powers, then, imposed its veto? Only one Power had the slightest interest in Crete, and that was Russia, who might possibly desire to have Crete as a place of refuge for her fleet. Russia appeared to have raised her finger to the Prime Minister, and that was enough. ["Hear, hear!"] The Jingoism which had so long intoxicated itself to platform swagger—[Ministerial laughter and cheers]—had resulted in a policy of surrender, and now, when the Party which had a monopoly of English patriotism and Imperialism was faced by a single Power in the Concert, it yielded, and said, "We must not leave the Concert, because, if we do, we cannot do anything for Crete." ["Hear, hear!"] To such an extent had the effacement of England gone in the course of two years that, unless she marched to the three Emperors, she must not move. [Cheers.] Unless she pledged and pawned her credit and influence and Navy she must sit perfectly still, and have no policy at all. That was what had come of the policy of bounce and bastard Imperialism. [Cheers.] The defence the Prime Minister made in his speech yesterday was a very remarkable one, for he now based his policy on the high and solemn ground of the sanctity of treaties, and particularly of the Treaty of Paris, a Treaty which had been broken over and over again by every party that affixed its name to it, a Treaty which had been ignored by everyone, and which the Prime Minister 20 years ago treated as a wholly negative instrument. ["Hear, hear!"] That Treaty had now become a sacred obligation in the view of the Prime Minister, an obligation of such remarkable and mysterious sanctity that it was superior to all moral obligations. Some time ago the country was told that it had put its money on the wrong horse, but, according to yesterday's speech, we had bought the wrong horse. The Prime Minister suggested that the horse had turned out a kicker. It was bought unconditionally. By that Treaty we became unconditionally bound to the integrity of the Turkish Empire, and in the name of all that was high and holy and legal we must allow no one to limit the sphere of its operations. That was the excuse now made for the policy of the Government, and he ventured to describe that policy as not only wicked, but stupid. ["Hear, hear!"] The fact was that no Member of the Government knew what any other Member of the Government meant by the independence and integrity of Turkey. In the same speech in which the Under Secretary likened the Turkish Empire to a bankrupt stock, he went on to talk of the integrity of the Turkish Empire as being consecrated and enshrined in the Code of Europe—whatever the Code of Europe might mean—["hear, hear!"]—and as being a part of international law which Europe alone could modify. There was no law, least of all international law, which could give any title against its own subjects to a Government which systematically encouraged massacre and plunder. ["Hear, hear!"] To say that Europe alone could modify the integrity of such an empire, was to condemn millions of its subjects to outrage. ["Hear, hear!"] If they were not strong enough in themselves to get reforms, they were entitled, whether Europe liked it or not, to invoke those of their own race and creed outside their border. It was monstrous to say that to give such assistance was a breach of international law, and an immoral and unholy act. ["Hear, hear!"] The Opposition were told over and over again that they were sentimental. He was not ashamed of that. ["Hear, hear!"] In 1878, when the Prime Minister was pursuing the same course which he was now pursuing, the sentimentalists objected. What was the result? He failed in his policy in Bulgaria. The establishment of a peaceful, and prosperous, and an independent State was the result. He had succeeded in his policy in Armenia, and what had been the result? He was unable to say enough to give a description of the Prime Minister's success there—a success which had been absolutely disastrous. Yet he was spoken of as a Nestor among European statesmen, always strong and resolute, never drifting, never surrendering the honour of England. [Cheers and Opposition laughter.] They had only to remember that contrast, that failure in Bulgaria and success in Armenia. The sentimentalists were right then, and he thought the sentimentalists would come well out of the present contest. Sentimentalists might not always be well informed, but it was wiser than the cynicism and indifference to the broad mass of sympathy which moved mankind. ["Hear, hear!"] But there was a stupidity worse than that. There was a stupidity of brutality, and if the policy which had now been sketched by a high authority were carried out it would be a policy of brutality. It seemed to be the same policy which the Tory Party pursued in 1878, and no doubt it would meet with the same condemnation at the hands of the English people. He begged to move the Motion which stood in his name.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe) said that in the neighbourhood in which he resided this question commanded more attention than any other. He entirely concurred in the references of the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Robson), to sentiment and cynicism. The English people wanted to know on which side was placed the power and the influence of this country. ["Hear, hear!"] During the last year or two we had had recrudescences of what was called the Eastern Question, but this was only another way of explaining the crisis which occurred in the disintegration of the Ottoman Empire. [Opposition cheers.] He wished to call the attention of the Committee to Armenia, because he thought that Armenia had been lost sight of during the past few weeks. During every Session of the present Parliament, Armenia had been brought before their notice in the Queen's Speech; and the Blue-books which had been issued to Members, in a somewhat belated fashion and in fragments—["hear, hear!"]—had been most awful and terrible reading. The perusal of these Blue-books had almost deprived him of sleep. He could not understand the constitution of the man who had waded through the pages of our own Consular Reports and Sir Philip Currie's Dispatch and did not feel his very nature almost changed by the horrors there disclosed. [Opposition cheers.] Irrespective of Party politics, all were agreed as to the awful character of the occurrences in Asia Minor. In Crete, too, there existed a state of things which all must regard as extremely unsatisfactory. In July last the Under Secretary of State promised Parliamentary Papers on the subject of Crete, but these Papers were not laid upon the Table of the House until March this year. When such circumstances were going on in Eastern Europe and in Crete no possible circumstances justified putting the right hon. Gentleman in this position, that the promise he made to the House in July was not fulfilled until March. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. CURZON: I did not promise.

Mr. J. ELLIS assured the right hon. Gentleman that he had read every page of these Blue-books, and there was quite sufficient to show that the state of things was unsatisfactory in the highest degree. On the authority of our own Consuls there was the most conclusive evidences that the Turkish troops on one occasion fought during an armistice and at another time plundered the Christian inhabitants, while officers stood by without making the slightest attempt to interfere. These were only an illustration of what had occurred in hundreds of cases; but the vital point to consider now was, what had really been the policy of Great Britain under these circumstances? There was not a Government in Europe that had been more ready throughout the century to promise the granting of reforms on paper than the Porte; but there was the terrible commentary on the promises of the Sultan, that most terrible massacre at Constantinople, a massacre deliberately planned and arranged by the highest authorities in Constantinople. All the arrangements for the Constantinople massacre were deliberately made—[Mr. Gibson Bowles: "No!"]—by the highest authorities in Constantinople. He was astonished to hear the hon. Member for King's Lynn cast doubt upon it.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES: I absolutely deny it.

Mr. JOHN ELLIS said that something more than a mere assertion on the part of the hon. Gentleman was required. ["Hear, hear!"] Within the last few months there had been the massacre at Tokat. What would be asked in future was, how did Great Britain act through this crisis at the end of the 19th century? We stood to-day in a much worse position as regarded humanity and freedom than we did a year or two ago; England stood in a position of shameful and humiliating failure. He read with amazement and almost with indignation some of the sentences in Lord Salisbury's speech yesterday. His Lordship took Lord Kimberley to task in another place for his emphatic repudiation of the contention that we should maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and yet the First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking when they met on the 11th of February last year, said, "We are free from any engagement as to the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire." The right hon. Gentleman was Ambassador Extraordinary in 1881, knew the whole subject and was a Member of the present Cabinet, and therefore spoke with authority. How could the right hon. Gentleman's words be regarded for a single moment as consistent with Lord Salisbury's appeal to that most antiquated diplomacy the Treaty of Paris? Liberals read Lord Kimberley's declaration with the greatest pleasure, for his Lordship said:—

> "I say there is nothing in the Treaty or in the present situation of the world which should preclude anyone in my position from announcing, as I did announce, and I wish to announce, and to repeat, that I believe it is for the interest of this country, and it is for the interest of European peace, that we should be disconnected for ever from regarding the integrity of the Empire of Turkey as the basis of British policy."

The means by which the Government were trying to carry out their policy, whatever it might be, was the precious Concert, or, as Lord Salisbury called it, the Federation of Europe. With some people the Concert of Europe seemed to have become a sort of fetish; but that Concert, as at present revealed, was nothing more nor less than a Concert of the Emperors of the three despotic

Powers. Freedom seemed to be regarded as a sort of impertinence. He noticed in one of the Blue-books a most significant sentence in regard to the matter of freedom and insurrection. The Foreign Minister of one of the despotic Powers was reported to have said that—

> "the most important object to obtain is to make it clear that nothing is to be gained by revolt."

In his opinion, what Lord John Russell called the sacred right of insurrection must always be preserved. He protested against the idea that underlaid the sentence he had just quoted. We seemed to be going back 70 years; we might be living in the days of the Holy Alliance. The Layback Circular of 1821 contained the following words:—

> "Useful and necessary changes in legislation and in the administration of States ought only to emanate from the free will and well-defined conviction of those whom God has made responsible for power."

That Circular created a great sensation in this country. It was too strong for even the Castlereagh stomach, and the Government of the day were compelled by public opinion and by the opinion of the House of Commons to issue a Circular to the effect that such a policy as that was "in direct repugnance to the fundamental laws of the United Kingdom." He was not against a Concert of Europe, if it were a Concert of the right sort. But a Concert must be judged by its acts and its policy, and the value of a Concert or Federation entirely depended upon how far it was representative of the highest instincts of humanity. He, therefore, asked the Government now to declare what their policy was. Were they going to place the power, weight, majesty and might of this great country at the tail of the despotic Empires of Europe? He would give the Government the freest hand in regard to foreign policy, but Parliament ought to know the general principles at least on which the Government acted. If asked what Liberal principles were, he should say that Liberals denied that we were in any way bound up with that formula to which Lord Salisbury attached so much importance. They agreed with the First Lord of the Admiralty that we were not bound to raise hand or foot in defence of the maintenance of the Ottoman Empire, and they contended that this country ought never to place any obstacle in the way of those populations, subjects of Turkey, who were struggling to be free. Above all, Governments and Concerts ought to have as their fundamental basis the welfare of the people governed. He hoped they would hear to-night that Her Majesty's Government had determined to no longer pursue that which seemed to him a most evil path.

CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E. R., Holderness) said that the hon. Member for South Shields took the opportunity in the earlier part of his speech, which was specially devoted to the question of Crete and Greece, to make what he was sure the House would admit to be a grotesque caricature of the policy of Lord Salisbury. There had been some recent exhibitions of swagger on the platform, but it had not been by Conservative or Unionist statesmen. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members opposite, almost without exception, refrained from saying what was the policy which they would wish the Government to pursue in the present circumstances. Three policies only could be followed. One was to take part in the Concert of Europe; another was to abstain; and a third was to fight for Greece. Did hon. Members wish that we had stood aside and not used that influence which had notoriously been used in favour of Greece? Did they think we should have taken up arms in favour of Greece? He was glad to have the opportunity of recording his opinion that, in this part of the question, in endeavouring to free Crete from the rule of the Turk, the Government had acted wisely and in the best interests of liberty. The last speaker had referred to the Holy Alliance, but did he believe that the present Foreign Minister was seeking, not to follow the policy of Mr. Canning, but to support the policy of the despots of the Holy Alliance? ["Hear, hear!"] There was not a word of evidence to show that the policy of Lord Salisbury had been other than one seeking to give the utmost liberty to those concerned. [Cheers.] Both hon. Gentlemen who had spoken had criticised what Lord Salisbury had recently said about the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. But the policy of Lord Salisbury had been clearly defined in the series of speeches which he had made during the last two years. The first of these, delivered at the Mansion House, was brimming with a policy of freedom, of endeavouring to liberate people who now in many cases groaned under the rule of the Turk. None of his recent speeches contradicted that policy.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): What about his acts?

CAPTAIN BETHELL said there had been but one act since then—the freeing of Crete from the rule of the Turk. [Cheers and cries of "Oh!"] Hon. Members took umbrage at what Lord Salisbury said about the necessity of maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire. But, as had been explained, that was but a useful phrase under which great areas of country had been freed from the rule of the Turk. Under that phrase, Bulgaria, Bosnia and Servia had been placed in a position of substantial and real independence; and it was not correct, therefore, to say that, in the policy he was now pursuing, Lord Salisbury was not acting in the interests of liberty. That policy received the support of the Unionist Party—a Party which was as strongly infused with the doctrine of freedom as were Gentlemen opposite, and which, though its views were not expressed so emotionally, had succeeded in giving as much freedom to subject races as had ever been given by its opponents. ["Hear, hear!"] So long as the Government pursued the policy of seeking with other Powers to remove the shackles of tyranny from those races subject to the rule of the Turk, he felt, as a lover of freedom and liberty throughout the world, that he could conscientiously give them his support. [Cheers.]

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) did not think anyone would desire to deny the hon. and gallant Gentleman's claim to be a lover of freedom, and he hoped the tone which the hon. and gallant Gentleman had adopted might be pursued throughout the Debate. He remembered the Debates of 1878-80, and he believed that infinite mischief was done by the extreme degree of Party heat which entered into the discussions of that time. No one desired to charge hon. Gentlemen opposite with callousness in regard to the indescribable horrors contained in the Armenian Blue-books; and they must feel that those horrors were by no means ended. The last Blue-book dealing with the Armenian Question which he had read contained an account of how 30 Druse women were killed fighting against the Turks. The reason why those women forgot their sex was apparent in the descriptions of the horrors to which the Christian inhabitants of that country were subjected at the hands of the Turks; and in those descriptions also were to be found the key to the true meaning of the action of Greece and in the refusal of the Cretans to pay any heed to the promises of autonomy made to them by the Great Powers. ["Hear, hear!"] No one could deny that Lord Salisbury desired to put an end to those horrors. He would be the last to ascribe malevolence or want of decent feeling to the noble Lord, who, so far as he knew, was as humane a Gentleman as any Member of the House. But what made them wince when they thought of the position of affairs in the East was the absolute failure of this country to secure the object it had in view. He was convinced from his reading of the Blue Books that Lord Salisbury had done everything in his power to induce the Powers to join in doing the only thing that would have any effect on the Turk—that was, to use force or to make it absolutely certain that if necessary sufficient force would be used to compel the Turk to submit. Lord Salisbury was unsuccessful in that policy; but he did not suppose that the noble Lord was unsuccessful because of any selfishness on the part of this country. He hoped that when all that had taken place was revealed it would be proved that this country had said in the Concert of Europe: "However we value our traditional interest in the Mediterranean and our influence there, we are not going to purchase any advantage for ourselves at the price of subjecting to unspeakable miseries millions of persons under Turkish rule." But he thought the Government ought to have seen, from the course of the negotiations in regard to Armenia, that the so-called Concert of Europe was nothing better than a group of greedy, selfish, pitiless, heartless Powers. [Cheers.] If ever there was an order given to them from Heaven it was that all that was best in European civilisation—all that claimed to be even akin to Christianity—ought to have inflicted punishment on the Turks for the terrible outrages they had committed; and, if there was any real desire for the progress of humanity and civilisation among those Powers, Turkey would not have been allowed to continue its despotic domination over Armenia and Crete. [Cheers.] His complaint against the Government was that, having seen the failure of their well-intentioned efforts in the case of Armenia, they had not realised what the real character of the Concert of Europe was, or, having realised it, that they had not acted upon it. Then came the question of Crete. Greece was, indeed, the mother country of Crete, and nothing could be more natural than the desire of the Cretans to be united with their kin on the mainland. ["Hear, hear!"] The Turks could not be got to do anything to improve the position of affairs in the island, and until Colonel Vassos landed there had been continual pillaging and fighting. The fact was that the Powers had been merely trifling in regard to the island, and had made no real effort to get Turkey to carry out the promised reforms. Then it was that Her Majesty's Government made a great mistake. They went into a combination with the Great Powers; they agreed to land troops in the island, and they came hastily to the conclusion that they would not allow Crete to pass to Greece, which, he was informed, would not have been so unacceptable even to the Mahomedan inhabitants of the island. ["Hear, hear!"] They would not suffer the union between the Greeks and the Cretans, and all these misfortunes had followed. This country lost its initiative. The blockade of Crete was a shocking thing. ["Hear, hear!"] There were many women and children and a large number of non-combatants in the interior of the island; had adequate provision been made to prevent that blockade from inflicting famine upon these people?

Mr. CURZON: It is inflicted on Mahomedans.

Sir R. REID said the Mahomedans were in the towns. What he referred to was the notification that food and supplies were not to be taken into the interior—that was to say, where the Christians were. But he did not care two straws in this controversy whether a man was a Christian or a Mahomedan. The question was, how could the blockade be justified? What had the population of Crete done to bring this blockade upon them? They had done nothing. The right hon. Gentleman had informed them on a previous occasion that the object of the blockade was to drive the Greek forces out of Crete. The first consequence of the determination not to allow the union between Crete and Greece was the blockade of Crete. Then there were the bombardments, which would not be forgotten by the people who had the honour of this country at heart. ["Hear, hear!"] The object of our Navy was not to bombard people who were endeavouring to shake off a hideous yoke, as these people were. He could not but think that we had been obliged to acquiesce in the retention of the Turkish troops in Crete, and as long as those troops remained there the insurgents would never be satisfied that they were going to have autonomy. In the case of the fragments of the Turkish Empire which had been detached, such as Bosnia, Herzegovina, or Bulgaria, where a successful autonomy had been obtained, the Ottoman troops had not been allowed to remain. ["Hear, hear!"] The retention of the Turkish troops was absolutely incompatible with autonomy. When this country was asked to join in preventing the union of Crete with Greece we ought to have said that we would not consent to make any such declaration. In 1886, when Greece was blockaded by Mr. Gladstone's Government, France refused to take part in the blockade, but France did not thereby incur the enmity of the other Powers. Great Powers like France and Great Britain would not be treated as being outside the Concert because they refused to take part in a wrong that was being done.

Captain BETHELL: We should have lost our influence.

Sir R. REID said he did not hold the power of his country as cheaply as the hon. and gallant Member seemed to do. Let them remember what had been the history of our country during the last 100 years; very often our power had been most effective without our having fired a single gun. At the time of the Holy Alliance we refused to enter upon a wrong course, and if we had done so at the present juncture we should have been regarded as friends by the Greeks, with that touching affection which they always exhibited towards those who displayed the smallest sign of kindness. In that way we should have been able to influence the Greek Government in a way which was not possible by fleets or bombardments. He did not believe the friendship and good will of this country was so cheap a thing that the Continental Powers would not willingly have made some effort to retain it. He had indicated the ground on which he thought this Vote ought certainly to be denied. He hoped they would have another and a fuller opportunity of discussing the whole subject. It was not the fault of some of them that that opportunity had not come already, but sooner or later he trusted the question would be raised in a deliberate and formal manner by the right hon. Gentleman, who unquestionably was the first man on that side of the House. He perfectly recognised that they might preserve the territorial integrity of Turkey, and yet put the subject populations in the same position as those of Bosnia, Herzegovina, or Bulgaria. But what security had the Government that this would be done? They had grave reason to fear that the word "autonomy" might be construed in such a way that the Turkish troops in Crete might be retained. He should be delighted to be corrected if he was wrong. He hoped, at all events, that the Government would adhere to the determination that the Cretans should be rescued from the dominion of the Turk, that the last Turkish soldier should leave the island, and that their autonomy should be real and not temporary. [Cheers.]

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport), who rose amidst Ministerial cheers, said: The hon. Member for Rushcliffe, in seconding the Motion, asked the pertinent question, "How is Great Britain acting in this international crisis, on what side are the might and influence of this country to be cast?" I shall hope to show, in the course of the remarks which it will be my duty to make, that the influence of this country has been cast, and is being cast, on the side of peace, conciliation, and moderation; aye, I will say, and of freedom—[Ministerial cheers]—and if we have been retarded in the realisation of that plan by the rash counsels which have elsewhere prevailed, we have not abandoned our intention, and still hope to carry it to a successful issue. The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down made what I am sure he desired to be a moderate and just speech, and in that spirit I shall endeavour to answer him. His moderation, however, did not prevent him from failing to understand our case in some of its simplest aspects, and did not save him from totally misrepresenting some of what we believe to be the elementary features of the case. I may instance before I pass to my main argument one point alone. Speaking of the Constitution given to Crete in August last year, he said that Constitution had broken down, because, on the one hand of the obstruction of the Turks, and, on the other, of the apathy of the Powers. It is inconceivable that the hon. and learned Member would have made that statement if he had carefully studied the Blue-book which has most recently been presented. I see no inherent improbability in the first part of his argument. As a matter of fact, I believe it to be untrue. I have made the most careful efforts to get to the bottom of the case, and I am bound to say that the collapse of that Constitution of August, 1896, I believe, from the record of facts presented to the House, to have been due not in the main to the obstruction of the Turks, but to intrigues from another quarter which are fully narrated in the Blue-book. Since we last debated the Cretan question three weeks have passed. That period has not, I am sorry to say, greatly affected the situation in Crete; but it has, of course, profoundly modified the situation on the mainland. I shall endeavour to put before the House a brief statement of the position in the island, and will then pass on to what the House will expect me to say something about—namely, the policy of the Government as to the mainland. First, with regard to the island of Crete. A fanciful picture has been much drawn during the past few weeks, glimpses of which I have caught in more than one speech to-night, of the present state of the island. Society in Crete has been represented to us as divided, if I may use the metaphor, into sheep and wolves. The sheep are represented as being the Cretan Christians, and the wolves as the Cretan Mahomedans, who, along with the Turks, are engaged in preying upon and devouring the innocent Christians, assisted by the forces and guns of the Powers. What are the real facts of the case? The interior of the island of Crete at the present moment is in the occupation of a large number of Cretans, who the hon. Member says are doing nothing. May I describe what the inactivity of those Cretan Christians is? These so-called insurgents are in the occupation of the villages and in the enjoyment of the possessions and crops of the unhappy Mussulmans who have been turned out. They are living a life of armed idleness, wandering up and down the mountains, exchanging shots with everybody they meet—[laughter]—and, I am sorry to say, killing every Mahomedan, of either sex, who falls within their reach. [Opposition murmurs.] I am stating nothing but what I know to be facts, which are corroborated by the evidence which will be laid later before the House. [Opposition cries of "When?" and Mr. MACNEILL: "Produce it now!"] Near the towns these Christian insurgents are engaged, in spite of the reiterated warnings which have been received by them, in attacks on the blockhouses and outposts of those positions, and in cutting off the water supply, and endeavouring to starve the populations collected within their walls. [Mr. DILLON: "You are starving them!"] Will the hon. Member allow me? These insurgents are, to a large extent, led by Greek officers, their ranks are filled by Greek volunteers, the only artillery they appear to possess are Greek cannon. In a recent interview which the Admirals had with eight of the so-called insurgent chiefs five were found to be Greek lawyers—[Ministerial laughter]—and the sixth was a Greek doctor. [Renewed laughter.] Though the Greek authorities, when appealed to with reference to their action, have disowned all responsibility for these insurgents, I have observed that there is no similar disposition to condone or disown any irregularities which are committed by the Bashi-Bazouks on the other side; and so entirely are these insurgents controlled by the influence of the Greek occupying force that an application having been made by them the other day to the Admirals for stores and relief, and those stores having been promptly placed at their disposal, they were compelled to return them unused. This is the simple population represented to us as rightly struggling to be free against the barbarous oppression of the Turks. [Opposition cheers.] Obviously no amount of arugument or evidence that I can produce affects the a priori convictions of hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Ministerial cheers, and Mr. MACNEILL: "Produce the evidence!"] I must ask the hon. Member to take my word for it. ["Hear, hear!"] Now I come to the point raised by the hon. and learned Member who has just spoken, that we are "bombarding and starving" these innocent people. The phrase was first used by the Leader of the Opposition when—I think in the last Debate in this House—he told us we were trying to starve and bombard the Cretans into the acceptance of autonomy. It is a good phrase, and it fell glibly from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman. But it is absolutely destitute of any foundation in fact. What are the facts about the alleged starvation caused by the blockade of which the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken is so much in dread? The reports that have been received from persons who have been moving freely about among the insurgents in the interior assure us that the canteens and eating houses are doing "a roaring trade," that food is everywhere abundant, and now that the crops are about to be gathered there will be no lack of provisions, because the Christians will not only have their own crops but those of the evicted Mussulmans as well. [Laughter.] These facts, which I have narrated to the House, represent a faithful picture, so far as I can depict it, of society as it at present exists in that island, and I do not think any hon. Gentleman in this House would say that it can be described as an era of pastoral innocence, or that in Crete we have any reproduction of the Saturnian age. [Laughter.] I next turn to what is passing in the towns, and here I must deal with the topic raised by two or three preceding speakers about the continuance of Turkish troops in the island. More than one speaker has said: "Your intentions may be excellent, your promises may be sound, but your execution is feeble." [Opposition cheers.] "You have expressed your desire to get rid of the Turkish troops, why not do it?" And an extraordinary and mysterious notion has sprung into existence that the Turkish troops are being kept in Crete by the malevolent action of the majority of the Powers, that England is in favour of their removal, but that there are certain other Powers, to be named or nameless, who exercise a malignant influence in the background, behind whose chariot wheels we are content to be dragged, and who interfere with the successful realisation of our plans. These are not at all the facts of the case. May I put before the House what are the facts with regard to the coast towns and the Turkish troops in them? The principal seaports of Crete are in the occupation of the international forces. In these seaports there are next to no Christians. Either they have fled into the interior or have been deported by British and foreign ships to other shores. But these towns are packed by dense populations of Mahomedan refugees—homeless, defenceless, and with no means whatever of subsistence. Take a concrete case to make my argument clear. Take the case of Candia. It is a town in which we are principally interested, owing to the occupying force being in the main supplied by Her Majesty's troops. In Candia there are at the present moment no fewer than 50,000 Mahomedan refugees, of whom 32,000 have no connection with the locality, but come from different parts of the island, and as compared with this enormous aggregate there are only 500 Christians. These 50,000 Mahomedans are peasants who have no handicraft of their own and no means of making money, and who are only kept alive from day to day by doles of flour sent by the Sultan; who are decimated by smallpox and afflicted by a perpetual cutting off of their water supply; for it should be known that in the country outside the cordon drawn round Candia, containing this defenceless population of 50,000 Mahomedans, there are 60,000 armed Cretan insurgents ready at any moment, if the protection we afford them be withdrawn, to pounce down upon these people and to inflict upon them the utmost cruelty. How are these Mahomedans protected? There are in the town of Candia something under 1,500 European troops, and there are some 3,500 Turkish troops. The Europeans occupy the town, and the Turkish troops occupy and defend the military cordon drawn outside. Our authorities report to us that the European troops are powerless to protect both the town and cordon. How can we under these circumstances withdraw the Turkish garrison? I can only say, if we did so, it would be a prelude to massacres compared with which those of Armenia would sink into insignificance, and it would be massacre enacted under the eyes of the Powers and with our direct responsibility. [Ministerial cheers.] The hon. Member who preceded me spoke of sentiment as affecting this case, and he said what I am sure he felt himself and what I am equally sure is felt by most people in this House, that humanity as understood by him is not a one-sided emotion. His humanity is equally aroused by Moslem and by Christian, and suffering in any quarter appeals to him. I submit that the incontestable figures which I have put before the Committee show that in this case of Crete the question of humanity arises not only in the case of the Christians but also in the case of the Mahomedans. [Cheers.]

Sir R. REID: I quite agree with that. May I point out this also? There are only three possible courses. The first course is for the European Powers to defend these people; the second is to have the Turks, and the third is to have the Greeks. Either you must do it all yourselves or leave it to the tender mercies of the Turks. You refuse the Greeks: that is my argument. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. CURZON: Yes; but the Greeks are endeavouring to kill them. If, however, I may be allowed to resume my argument, I would point out that the Admirals, as is well known, were the first to recommend the withdrawal of the Turkish garrison from Crete. It was very natural they should do so, because it would greatly simplify the difficult and delicate task which has been placed on their shoulders. But even they say that this Turkish garrison, for the reasons I have named, cannot at this moment be spared. Of course the Committee must not from that draw the conclusion that the Turkish troops are to remain permanently in the island. The hon. Gentleman said he knew of no case in which autonomy had been set up in which the Turkish troops had not eventually been withdrawn. Quite true. But he failed to point out any case in which, while autonomy was being established, there was not an adequate Turkish garrison in the place. ["Hear, hear!"] We firmly hope for, and we look forward with absolute confidence to, the time when the Turkish troops will be withdrawn. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government have so often repeated their pledges on this point that I should have thought it unnecessary to emphasise them in this Debate, but I have been trying to explain to the Committee—and I hope I have succeeded — the reason why that policy, which remains exactly where it was, and from which we do not recede for one moment, is absolutely incapable of being carried into immediate execution. ["Hear, hear!"] What I have said of Candia is true also of Retimo. At Retimo the population, which before was 10,000, has been swollen by the immigration of refugees to 30,000. A census, which has been taken by the Relief Committee, of Mahomedans shows at this moment, after all that has passed, that there are in the island as many as 107,000 Mahomedans, or one-third of the total population of Crete. This is what the hon. Gentleman called a residuum, as if it was a petty tenth, or twelfth, or fifteenth, whereas it is one-third of the whole population. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member said Greece was the motherland, and that it was natural she should act on behalf of her sons in Crete. [Cheers.] Yes, Sir, but she has Mahomedan as well as Christian sons. [Cheers.] Both look to her as a mother; they are of the same race, and I cannot understand why all the maternal sympathy should be reserved for the 200,000 Christians and absolutely denied to the 107,000 Mahomedans. [Cheers.] I should add that out of these 107,000 Mahomedans in the island, no fewer than 67,000 are at the present moment in receipt of relief. We are told that the island of Crete is clamouring for annexation to Greece. This minority, this one-third of the population, amounting to as large a proportion as in the case of Ireland, refused the offer of Home Rule—a minority to whose views great respect was attached, at any rate by this side of the House—this minority says that under no circumstances will it accept annexaxtion to Greece, but will fight to the death or emigrate. We do not want to depopulate the island of Crete either by massacre or by emigration. [Cheers.] The Cretan Mahomedans are about the most stable element in the population of that country. They are sturdy peasants who are wanted for the cultivation of the village crops, and whether annexation is given or withheld, whether autonomy is granted or proves a failure, there will be no hope for the future of Crete until the passionate, embittered vendetta between these two sections of the population subsides, and the rural population are allowed to go back to live in tranquillity in the villages, while the urban population equally go back to the towns. [Cheers.] This is impossible while the Greek troops remain in the island. It cannot be doubted that the presence of the Greek troops in Crete is a focus of agitation and a centre of intrigue. I have often said it would be the first dawn of a brighter day for Crete if these Greek troops were withdrawn, and I hope I may be justified in drawing from the retirement of Colonel Vassos and some other Greek officers that which seems to me the natural and obvious conclusion—namely, that the troops will shortly follow in like manner. [Cheers.] When the Greeks have been withdrawn, it will be found possible to reduce the Turkish garrison, and then we may begin to secure some restoration of confidence and order in the island. These facts, I think, are an answer to the question which was put me by the mover of the Amendment, who was very anxious to know what was the autonomy, and why it was not being set up? Is it not obvious, in an island so hopelessly sundered as I have described, and in the disorganised condition which I have narrated, that the proposal to set up a new constitution, to convene an assembly, to appoint or elect a ruler, would at present be an act of fatuity? ["Hear, hear!"] There is one other argument I should like to deal with before I pass from Crete, and that is the argument which was adumbrated rather than followed out by the hon. Gentleman—namely, that the Powers, before the declaration of war, should have evacuated Crete, and, to use a vulgar but classical phrase, should have let the Cretans stew in their own juice. I do not think that proposal will bear examination for one moment. If, after the declaration of war between the Greeks and the Turks, England and the other Powers of Europe had withdrawn from Crete, what would have happened? In the first place, the island would have been made the cockpit of a most fratricidal struggle, for carrying out the metaphor of the hon. Member, these children of the same mother would have been cutting one another's throats, and we should have witnessed one of the most shameful warfares to which history can point. [" Hear, hear! "] Supposing that Colonel Vassos and the insurgents had prevailed, for they had the superiority in numbers, in arms, and in cannon, they would probably have succeeded in wiping out the minority, and then, when all was over, what would have happened? If there is one thing certain from the war up to this point—and I am sure I do not desire to say anything harsh about it—it is, I think, that victory has not inclined to the side of the Greeks. No telegrams from Athens, no sentiment, no partiality can blind our eyes to that fact. It is a common axiom of warfare that the spoils of war are to the conqueror, and in the readjustment that must have taken place, and that will take place after the conclusion of the war, who can believe for one moment, whatever might have been the preliminary successes of Greece in Crete, that there would not be an absolute end to autonomy and an end for ever to annexation, and that wretched, unhappy Crete would have been put once again through the furnace of her afflictions before she reverted to the dominion of the Turk? [Cheers.] The Concert of Europe may have many weaknesses and many faults, but at least it is innocent of the criminal responsibility that would have been entailed by any such consequence as that. [" Hear, hear! "] On that point the Powers have been absolutely unanimous from the start. They have agreed that Crete, having been taken under their protection, must so remain, and that, therefore, it must be proclaimed as neutral ground during the duration of the war. The answer to the question put to me as to the reason for maintaining the blockade is that the blockade has proved most effective in keeping out from the island arms, ammunition, and explosives, and, therefore, in mitigating the suffering and loss of life that would otherwise have ensued. [Cheers.] This policy the Committee may be assured, the Government and the Powers will continue to pursue. [Cheers.] It may take them a long time, it will certainly take a longer time than was originally expected, but I am sure the worst advice anybody could give in the interest of Crete would be that, having taken it in hand, they should now desist. [" Hear, hear! "] I hope the facts which I have stated will avail somewhat to explain the situation in Crete. [Cheers.] It is surely time that we passed out of the world of fiction, and that our footsteps were directed only in the paths of truth and common sense. [Cheers.] It would really seem as if Crete had never passed out of the mythic age. [Cheers.] In a previous debate I remember having to expose no less than 12 fables which had grown up in the course of this crisis. [" Hear, hear! "] The latest crop has, I think, not been the least fanciful. I have already exposed this evening the starvation fable which has played so prominent a part in the platform polemics of hon. Gentlemen opposite; and now there are two more fables which, before I pass from the question of Crete, I must be allowed respectfully to upset. [" Hear, hear! " and Opposition laughter.] The first is the fable which played so large a part in the questions which used to be put to me a fortnight ago, and which appeared in the statement issued by Colonel Vassos—that the Mussulmans who had been relieved from their beleaguered positions at Selino and Candano had been armed by the Turks at Canea and sent out to work their wicked will on the Christians. An international Commission was appointed to inquire into this allegation, and they found that there was absolutely no foundation for the statement at all. [Cheers.] They were put in possession of the certificates, signed by the insurgent chiefs to whom the arms had been handed over, and they found further that the Turks could not have distributed any more arms for the simple reason that they had none to distribute. [Laughter and cheers.] The only arms distributed since February in Canea have been some which were issued at the end of that month to private persons in the town for enrolling a sort of special gendarmerie to assist in the maintenance of order. These arms have since been withdrawn. [" Hear, hear!"] The third fable which, in the interests of truth, I feel bound to expose is one relating to the Turkish soldiers. An impression undoubtedly very widely exists that the Turkish soldiers in Crete are with difficulty restrained from committing horrible acts. I assure the House I am not concerned to defend Turkish soldiers or Greek soldiers. I have no feeling one way or the other. My only desire is to see justice done between the two and to correct any particularly unfair representations that may be about. An hon. Member who preceded me brought forward certain cases of misbehaviour on the part of the Turkish troops last year. When these cases are quoted, I think it only fair as regards the present crisis to quote the testimony of the British Admiral, which is to this effect:—

> "The Turkish troops have behaved admirably, but religious fanaticism may possibly upset the great integrity which all other provocations have hitherto failed to do. Their conduct deserves their being treated as disciplined troops in this respect second to none of the European nations."

[Cheers.] I pass now to the question of the mainland. I do not desire in what I say to discuss the question as to who was the aggressor in this unhappy war. That seems to me to have become almost an academic question and to lack any immediate interest. I think few people can have any doubt on which side the provocation lay—[cheers]—but the rashness that lay behind that provocation has been so fearfully and terribly chastised that I think it is unnecessary to say anything more about it. But there is one charge I must meet because it has been repeated to-night, and that is the charge that the Concert of Europe is responsible for the war between Turkey and Greece. [Opposition cheers.] I cannot imagine how any hon. Member who has made an honest study of the facts can use so childish an argument as that. [Cheers.] What are the facts of the case? The Concert informed Greece that she would not be allowed to annex Crete; that Crete had become by their action a European concern. Thereupon Greece, because she could not get her way in Crete, massed a great number of her troops on the northern frontier, sent large bodies of irregulars forward to attack the Turks and then, when, after great provocation, and, I must say, a considerable display of patience—[cheers]—the Turks accepted the challenge and declared war, the friends of Greece turn round and said, "It is all the fault of the European Concert." [Laughter.] If the defence of Greece is that she is not responsible for the Ethnike Hetairia, then a fortiori the Concert must be still less responsible for the action of that body. But really such logic deceives nobody. Everybody knows perfectly well what the massing of those troops on the frontier meant. We were not obscurely told day after day in the columns of the newspapers that represent the Hellenic cause. Everyone knew that those troops were being collected there and that their presence could only mean war. Calamitous as the results of the war have been, I protest I cannot understand the method of reasoning by which anybody arrives at the conclusion that the responsibility rests on any shoulders but one. So far from the Powers being responsible, I should be prepared to argue that they have carried conciliation and consideration in the case of Greece almost to the point of weakness. They were told that if Greece were blockaded, following the example of right hon. Gentlemen opposite 11 years ago—[loud cheers]—war would infallibly result, and they desisted, therefore, from that step. They used every means, by representations, by provisions for keeping the combatants apart, and by declarations that the aggressor would not be allowed to profit by his aggression, to postpone the struggle; and, if they failed in the result, at any rate let the blame not rest on their shoulders. But, if they have not prevented war, has not something been done in limiting the area of that war—[cheers]—in localising the disturbances, and in preventing the infinitely greater and more serious danger of a European conflagration? [Cheers.] The hon. Member who moved this Motion was quite angry because when we speak of a European war we mean a war in which many European nations are involved, and he said that the claim of the Concert had been to prevent war of any kind. What they did undertake to do was, not to prevent the passion or rashness of Greece from plunging her into hostilities with Turkey, but what they did undertake, and what they have succeeded in doing, was to keep the peace in the eastern part of Europe. ["Hear, hear!"] I venture to say that that success constitutes an incalculable, and will be regarded as a historic, service in the history of European politics. [Cheers.] Now we come to the present situation. The Powers have been prepared to intervene, and are even now intervening to settle this disastrous struggle. [General cheers.] Lord Rosebery said, in 1886:—

> "No sane friend of Greece would wish that she should embark in war with one of the great military Powers of the world, even if she had a good cause to fight for."

It is a pity that there have not been more sane friends of Greece about. [Cheers.] It is a pity that there have not been more followers of Lord Rosebery—[loud cheers and Opposition laughter]—to repeat the words of that wise and experienced statesman in this House. The Powers have expressed their willingness to mediate, if Greece on her part will express her willingness to listen to their opinions. That is the general attitude of the Powers at this moment. I have no right, in my subordinate position, to commit any other Power or Government except our own, but that is the tenor of the negotiations which are proceeding at this moment. Her Majesty's Government desire, in common with their allies, to preserve the Greek kingdom. They sympathise with the development within due limits of the Hellenic instinct, but they are convinced—and the experience of the war adds to their conviction—that the interests of Greece lie, not in war or in expansion or in conquest, still less in defeat—[cheers]—but that they lie in the path of peaceful consolidation of her resources. [Cheers.] It is very easy to abuse the Powers, but I venture to say that the attitude taken up, and the words that are spoken by many hon. Gentlemen in this House, do not render the task of the Government more easy. [Cheers.] It is very easy to denounce the Concert of Europe. Any platform spouter can do that. [Laughter and cheers.] It is always easier to attack a Committee, the opinion emanating from whom is a corporate opinion, and the consequences of their action, than an individual; but is it politic, I ask, is it just, and is it wise? [Cheers.] If you had an alternative I could understand it. Denounce the Concert if you have something to set up in their place, but you come here barren of any policy—with your mouths full of denunciation and your brains empty of suggestion. [Loud cheers and Opposition laughter.]

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): That is very superior.

*MR. CURZON: I hope the hon. Gentleman will curb his irregularity and allow me to proceed. [Opposition laughter.] I venture to ask the Committee what is the good of denouncing the three Emperors, and what is the good of accusing us of being dragged at the heels of the despotic Powers of Europe? Supposing you were to take our places to-morrow or next week! I remember an occasion when a Liberal Ministry commenced its tenure of office by an apology to Austria. [Cheers.] If you came into power now, your first act would be an apology to Germany and to Russia. You may be sure that the more you abuse the Concert, and the more you attack the Sovereigns who constitute a portion of that Concert, the more you alienate the allies of this country, the more you render it difficult for this Government to get what it is anxious to get—namely, good terms for Greece—and the more you jeopardise the chances of a peaceful settlement. [Cheers.] I should like to conclude by a reference to what fell from the hon. Member for Rushcliffe. He pointed out, I think, with great force that there is really a wider question at stake than the mere defeat of one army or the victory of another, or the mere triumph of one cause over another. The real Eastern question is not simply a question of the victory or the defeat of Greece in this struggle. The real Eastern question is the better government of the peoples of the East—[general cheers]—the gradual widening of their liberties, the securing of proper guarantees for the prosperity of that autonomy which some of them have already secured, and which we hope will be extended to others in the future. [Cheers.] Those results are no doubt only arrived at by slow degrees. An hon. Member who spoke to-night seemed to doubt whether they would ever be attained. Surely the history of Egypt, of Bulgaria, of Rumelia, of Servia, and of Rumania is in itself a proof that the wider interests of the populations of the East have not been lost sight of by the Great European Powers. It is not a question of Crete alone. I quite agree that Crete is part of a much wider and bigger question in which Armenia plays no unimportant part. I confess I am shocked and distressed when I hear hon. Gentlemen opposite say that the Concert of Europe has abandoned Armenia to its fate. It is an unjust, and I may even say a shameful, misrepresentation. [Cheers.] No one who reads the Blue-book which brought the narrative of Eastern affairs up to October last year can fail to have seen that in that month Lord Salisbury had united the Powers on the principle of reforms, not for Armenia or Crete only, but for the provinces of the Turkish Empire, and on the principle of the application of coercion to the Sultan to carry out those reforms. Then came this Cretan trouble, and no doubt the ambitions of Greece have for the moment put the sufferings of Armenia into the background. But there has been no desertion, no abandonment; the question of Armenia and our interest in Armenia remains where it did before. If anything is to be done for Armenia or Crete, or for any one of the subject populations who have engaged the interest of everyone on both sides of the House, it must be patent now that it cannot be done by one Power alone. Isolation cannot effect anything in this matter. It can only be done by this or by any other Government acting in friendly co-operation with its allies. Neither personal ambition nor the desire of aggrandisement on the part of any individual State ought to be allowed to interfere with that desire. That is the policy which the Government have set before themselves consistently, and according to which they have hitherto acted; and when these storms have passed away I am convinced it will be found that it has been successful and has been supported by the common sense of the country. [Cheers.]

Sir HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) said the right hon. Gentleman had made what everyone who heard it would agree was a most remarkable speech. [Cheers.] It was a remarkable utterance to be made by any Member of the House speaking on behalf of the Government and representing a department which, surely, in the management of its affairs required delicacy of touch and expression beyond all other qualities. The right hon. Gentleman had departed from that dispassionate and fair spirit—[Ministerial cries of "No, no!" and cheers]—in dealing with the contentions which prevailed in the East of Europe which ought to have characterised his utterance. [Ministerial cries of "No!" and "How?"] This was the fourth or fifth occasion on which this Eastern question had been discussed in the House; but it had never been discussed with fulness and completeness, and could not now be discussed, because the Government had not seen fit to give the House all the information which he and his hon. Friends thought it was necessary to have. [Opposition cheers.] He doubted whether there had been a case in which the country had been kept to so great an extent in the dark as to what was being said in its name. [Opposition cheers.] They knew something of what had been done in its name; they knew that our ships were sent to Cretan waters, that our shells were fired, and that our forces were landed. But of the inner reasons, the hesitation, controversies, and decisions which led to those events the House and the country had been kept for the main part in ignorance. It was, therefore, difficult to discuss the part the Government might have played, because they did not know exactly what that part was. Take even the case of the instructions to the Admirals. The Admirals had been invested with extraordinary discretionary powers, but when they asked that the nature of those instructions should be communicated to the House they were met with a refusal, although on similar occasions before the request had been granted. The Government had wrapped themselves in the Concert of Europe as a mantle, and there was no profane person among them to lift even a fold of that august garment. [Laughter.] On the previous day an occasion arose when they formed the expectation of receiving further information. The Prime Minister was announced to address a great meeting of his followers in London. What did they receive instead of the information they desired? They had an exhibition of that cynical rhetoric and of those reckless jibes—[Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!"]—they were accustomed to from the Prime Minister, but no detailed information was forthcoming. On the other hand, there was a revelation which was almost equally important of the spirit in which Lord Salisbury at least regarded those great events. If this was the spirit which really guided our policy he thought they might despair of the credit and fair name of England. [Opposition cheers.] They must hope, however—and their past experience justified them in the hope—that when the Dispatches of the Foreign Minister came to be seen they would be found to breathe a different spirit, and to show at least some outward consideration for that cause of freedom and humanity to which the history of this country had always been devoted. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman had given an explanation of his view of the situation in Crete and in Greece. He was not going to inquire who was to blame for the lamentable struggle now going on in Greece. [Ironical laughter.] Hon. Members opposite assumed that Greece was the main culprit. ["Hear, hear!"] He wished to put that question aside for other times, when they would be able to judge of it. Whether Greece had acted wisely or foolishly, she had at least acted in a plucky and patriotic spirit. [Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!" and cheers.] She had put her fortune to the touch against her hereditary enemy; and he believed that among her people who were best informed there had been no great illusion as to the probable result. However it might detract from her wisdom in a worldly point of view, it did not detract from the honourable character of the struggle. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Powers were intervening. The universal voice of civilisation asked that that intervention should be speedy and effectual, and he was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that he appreciated the situation. It appeared to him that the conflict in which the two Powers were engaged partook much more of the character of what was known as an affair of honour than a regular affair of war; and so soon as the point of honour was satisfied, the struggle should be stopped. He hoped that no pedantries of etiquette would be allowed to stand in the way of any intervention which the Powers wished to make. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman said that the Cretans in the hill country were going about killing Mahomedans, that they were idling their time with guns in their hands. Did the right hon. Gentleman mean to imply any doubt as to the genuine character of the Cretan movement for freedom? Did he imply that these idling men were playing at being insurgents, and had not a stern purpose in their hearts? Then why was he, as a subordinate agent and mouthpiece of Europe, so anxious to give the Cretans autonomy? If the right hon. Gentleman's argument was good against anything, it was good against autonomy itself. ["Hear, hear!"] Then the right hon. Gentleman said that the Cretans were not only idle and mischievous, but that they were extremely well off for food. How had this blockade been so ineffective that it had not prevented the object which it was intended to prevent? The right hon. Gentleman said that the Turkish troops must be maintained in Crete in order to secure the safety of the Mahomedans in the towns, who were beset at this moment by a larger number of Christian fighting men than the population of the island. [Laughter.] But, whether this be so or not, the Turkish troops were to be retained for that purpose, and the Greek troops were to be withdrawn. He assumed that the Government were giving autonomy to the Cretans, and that they believed the Cretans were right in wishing to escape from the misgovernment of Turkey. If that was so, he asked the right hon. Gentleman to put himself in the position of a Cretan at this moment. A Cretan in the mountains knew very little of the Powers and about the negotiations going on; he was also happy enough to know nothing of the Debates in the House of Commons. [Laughter.] He did not receive a morning and evening paper at his door; but the one thing he knew was that so long as the Greek soldiers remained and the Greek flag flew there was some chance of redemption, and that the moment they disappeared, and the Turkish soldiers remained, he came to the conclusion that sooner or later, the grip of the Turkish power being upon him, he would be put back. ["Hear, hear!"] He believed that most impartial minds would consider that, whether autonomy or annexation to Greece was intended, the first thing to be done was to withdraw the troops, the outward and visible sign of Turkish power, from Crete. The right hon. Gentleman said that that could not be done because the troops were there to do police work—to protect life and preserve order. But the Powers had taken Crete under their protection and had landed forces there, and surely those forces might be utilised for preserving order. ["Hear, hear!"] The Leader of the House on a recent occasion had summed up the policy of the Government epigrammatically by saying that it was to secure freedom for Crete and peace for Europe. They certainly had not yet secured freedom for Crete—the circumstances were perhaps even less hopeful than before—and it could not be said that they had preserved the Continent of Europe from war. The ineffectiveness of their policy was probably due to their being the slaves of two phrases—namely, "the integrity of the Turkish Empire" and "the Concert of Europe." Of a phrase it might be said as of fire—that it was a good servant but a bad master. It might often be useful to embody a policy in a phrase, but to exaggerate the importance of the phrase and to set it up as an object almost of worship was likely to lead to error. What was meant by practical men when they spoke of the necessity of preserving the integrity of the Turkish Empire? They meant that, in the event of the dissolution—a not distant event as most people thought, whether friends or foes—of the Turkish Empire, antagonism would be occasioned in the Balkan Peninsula between Russia and Austria, who would have Germany behind her, and that this antagonism might lead to a disastrous war which would disturb the equilibrium of Europe. He admitted that if those deplorable results might follow it was desirable to postpone as long as possible the contingency that would lead to them. But was it not obvious that side by side with this policy of maintaining the integrity of the Turkish Empire they must have the other policy of enforcing reforms upon the Porte—["hear, hear!"]—and that by proclaiming, as the Concert of Europe was doing, the sacrosanctity of the dogma of the integrity of the Turkish Empire the Powers were depriving themselves of the strongest weapon at their disposal for securing reforms? If annexation to Greece was desired by the great bulk of the inhabitants of Crete, and if it was the shortest and easiest method of disposing of this difficulty, why should it be refused, and who could object? Could anybody doubt that that course would have been agreed to before this if it had not been for this doctrine of the integrity of the Turkish Empire, which had become almost a superstition? Hampering as this doctrine was, it apparently was not sufficiently so to satisfy the Prime Minister, who traced our duty to preserve Turkey to treaty obligations. "We are bound," he said at the Albert Hall, "to uphold Turkey irrespectively of good or bad government." Lord Salisbury turned matters of international convenience into binding obligations, and his theory seemed to be that all the Powers were bound to fulfil those obligations except the one Power for whose preservation they were entered into. That Power, apparently, might do what it liked. The doctrine propounded by the Prime Minister would be repudiated by the people of this country—["hear, hear!"]—and was only likely to find acceptance among diplomatic pedants and lovers of paradox. Where was the application of the doctrine of the integrity of the Turkish Empire to stop? Supposing that the Sultan were to give a looser rein to fanaticism and the spirit of misgovernment, supposing that massacres became not intermittent, but constant, was this country still to kneel before that doctrine? Could not any misgovernment by the Turk modify our obligations? The other phrase to which the Government were slaves was the "Concert of Europe." This was, perhaps, an even more august phrase. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had rebuked the Opposition for speaking disrespectfully of the Concert of Europe; but he was not aware that anyone had spoken disrespectfully of the several Powers who formed the Concert. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!" and "Hear, hear!"] The Concert was always spoken of by the Government as if there was no hope outside it, as if there must be an open quarrel with our neighbours if we should differ from it, and as if we should be left in isolated impotence if we were shut out of it. To all that he would reply in a word used the other night by a Minister of the Crown—"Nonsense."

[Laughter.] The Concert of Europe was not only admissible, but admirable on the hypothesis that the object of all its Members was the same. [" Hear, hear ! "] It was an admirable instrument, provided it meant co-operation, consultation, and mutual advice. What he objected to was that this country should be led into a fixed, cast-iron partnership which hampered and fettered its freedom of action. If we entered into any such close alliance we ought at least to be very fastidious about the partners whom we joined. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had told them on a previous occasion that the removal of the Turkish troops from Crete was objected to by the majority of the Powers. He would like to have a little more information on this point.

*MR. CURZON: On the occasion referred to what I said was that the majority of the Powers were of opinion that the Greek troops ought to go first. [" Hear, hear ! "]

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that the fact that a majority thought that the Greeks ought to go first involved the result that there was a minority who thought they ought not to go first. [" Hear, hear ! "] If there was to be a majority and a minority in this matter, it was perfectly obvious, from the slightest consideration of the circumstances, that England must in many cases be in the minority. He believed this was a point upon which the people of this country were exceedingly uneasy, and justly so. They did not like the notion of our being obliged to follow the lead and accept the dicta of the three Emperors in the East of Europe. [" Hear, hear ! "] Against those three Great Powers it was not necessary to say a word, and he did not wish to speak in a manner in the slightest degree derogatory of any of them; but it was a matter of common knowledge that in these matters affecting the securing of freedom to a people there could be no community of sentiment between them and us. [" Hear, hear ! "] One of these Great Powers had not the very slightest semblance or trace of representative institutions. Another, Germany, was a military absolutism in which, although there were representative bodies, they were debarred from any interference in foreign affairs, and the foreign affairs of that country were guided in a spirit which in this country was extinguished 2½ centuries ago. [" Hear, hear ! "] When he turned to the third Power, Austria, it was true that there was very much more of individual liberty in ordinary life there, but even in Austria there was no such thing as organised public opinion such as people in this country were accustomed to, and therefore the direction of foreign affairs was left entirely in the hands of their most enlightened Emperor and those who advised him. And when he turned to France and Italy, democratic, progressive, and freedom-loving as they were, he found their Governments, unfortunately for us, although it might be for excellent reasons of State policy, had tied themselves to certain of the other Powers in a way which prevented them from giving any expression to the generous feelings and impulses of the French and Italian people. Could it be wondered at that there was uneasiness amid such surroundings, or that people should wonder whether any freedom of action at all was retained for England? [" Hear, hear ! "] They repudiated the idea of any extraordinary sanctity attaching to the Concert of Europe. They were quite willing this country should take part in it on ordinary reasonable terms, but they wished to know what freedom of action there was. There had been no indication of freedom of action in the course of these Debates. People read that the Government objected to the blockade, and that their objection carried the day. That was satisfactory so far; but, looking back on it in the light of recent events, one might well ask, was that little outburst, after all, justified in a Minister who had shown himself to acquiesce in much more severe measures? [" Hear, hear ! "] The right hon. Gentleman yesterday gave the House very little information in answer to a question regarding the removal of the Turkish troops; but he was also asked a question as to the scheme of autonomy. The House would like to know a little more about that. What they wished to ask was not so much whether it had been promulgated and accepted by the Cretans, but whether it had been framed? ["Hear, hear ! "] To create a new Constitution for such a country was a very serious matter. It would have to be edited and re-edited if it was to represent the ideas and views of the six Powers and their emissaries and advisers. There were, first of all, the six Admirals on the spot, who had large discretionary powers, and great knowledge of the situation. They would be advised by the six Consuls, who were keeping them straight. Then the proposals of the six Admirals would have to go to the six Ambassadors at Constantinople, and be put into shape by them; and, finally, their proposals would be sent to be received or rejected by six Ministers in the six capitals. Thus 24 minds would be brought to bear on the scheme. [" Hear, hear! "] That was a terribly long process in itself, but it was made longer by the fact that one dozen of them differed from the other dozen fundamentally in the first conceptions of freedom and autonomy. [" Hear, hear! "] What was the alternative policy? It would—or he was entirely misinformed by the history of the past, or at all events by the records of the immediate past—have given satisfaction. It would have been to do as the people in whose interests Europe was acting desired—to hand over the island to Greece. [" Hear, hear! "] What individual Power could be injured by that? The Turk would lose the island anyway. Austria would not be injured, because Russia would get nothing, and similarly Russia would not be injured, and the Western Mediterranean Powers would all be in favour of it. But the Concert of Europe in its wisdom decided otherwise, and this country had submissively to accept that decision, and thus, reviewing the whole series of events, he could find nothing but humiliation—[" hear, hear! "]—humiliation to the diplomatic system of Europe which with such immense opportunities had achieved nothing but anger, war, and disappointment; and humiliation in a far greater degree to the people of this country whose name and power was being used at once against good sense and freedom and humanity. [Cheers.]

Mr. T. W. LEGH (Lancashire, Newton) said that the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken professed to be much exercised in his mind as to what was meant by the integrity of the Turkish empire. There were only two Gentlemen he could think of at the present moment—and one of them was prevented by the fortunes of war from being present—[laughter]—who attached to the phrase a different meaning to that which was accepted by the rest of the world. He took it that the phrase now meant something very different to what it meant 20, 30, or 40 years ago. At the present moment it amounted to little more than a diplomatic fiction—a phrase coined for the purpose of legalising the peaceful appropriation of Turkish territory by other people. [" Hear, hear! "] Under the protection of this phrase valuable provinces had been taken away from the Turk, and the only privilege he had retained over them was a nominal suzerainty and the right to a tribute, which in no instance was ever paid. What was really meant by the phrase which so disturbed hon. Gentlemen opposite was that no Power was to take any advantage of another Power by seizing territory, so to speak, out of its turn. [" Hear, hear! "] They had heard a great deal about autonomy in the course of the debate, and the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had asked for details of the proposed scheme for Crete. In his opinion it would be a great mistake to enter into the details of that plan. If details were promised by his right hon. Friend, they would have right hon. Gentlemen coming down and moving the adjournment of the House on the ground that a proper scheme of parish councils had not been provided. [" Hear, hear! "] It had always been represented that the Cretans did not want autonomy. Only as late as last November M. Delyanni expressed himself in these words; he said:—

> " Although the aspirations of the Cretans have not been fulfilled, a government has been accorded them which constitutes a tolerable form of autonomy."

Again, in the course of a debate in the Greek Chamber on December 1, M. Delyanni, who was more responsible than anybody else for the present position of affairs, said that—

> " since 1867, when he was accredited to the Emperor Napoleon III., he was convinced that the autonomy of Crete was the object to be sought for";

and he went on to say that—

> " the officers who deserted to Crete did no good there, and their conduct was a bad example. Their duty lay there, and not in Crete."

That was good evidence as to whether autonomy was of value or not. On December 7 there was a debate in the Greek Chamber, and M. Limbriti, a well-known member of the Cretan Committee, spoke to the effect that the Cretans did not ask for union with Greece, but only for an improvement in their condition. The subscriptions which came in from the Greeks of Egypt were most valuable, but the aid of the officers who went to Crete was the reverse. What would be thought of the sincerity of the Greek Government, considering the course pursued by M. Delyanni and his colleagues? Hon. Members opposite had reiterated their sympathy with the Greeks in this most unfortunate moment. For his part, he felt pity for them, but he could not feel much sympathy for their action. Everybody foresaw what was going to take place except the right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean. He was afraid the right hon. Gentleman's reputation as a military critic was likely to suffer severely, because on another occasion he prophesied disaster to the British troops in Egypt. Everybody except the right hon. Gentleman prophesied disaster to the Greek army, and disaster had come. The question now was, how were they going to be extricated? What would happen to any other Power in the like circumstances? Most undoubtedly they would be called upon to pay a heavy indemnity, and in all probability they would be obliged to surrender a large portion of their territory. Whenever it was a question affecting the Turks the matter was looked upon from a different point of view, and, whatever advantage the Turks obtained over the Greeks in the field, he did not believe they would be allowed to reap any benefit from it. Perhaps the most extraordinary assertion of all was that the Concert of Europe was responsible for this war. Suppose we had withdrawn from the Concert, who would have followed our example? The only result would have been that Crete would have been more firmly united than ever to the Turkish empire. The right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs was very reluctant to act with the Concert, because he considered, apparently, that the form of government of some States which belonged to the Concert was not democratic enough. He ventured to say that our relations with despotisms were at least as good as our relations with Republicans. Hon. Gentlemen opposite were very bold in their assertions as to the feeling which the Government's course of action had produced in the country. For his part, he was rather sorry that the opportunity was not taken, say, at Crewe, of testing popular opinion in relation to the policy of the Government on the Eastern Question. At all events, he was convinced that all who attached value to the extreme importance of maintaining the peace of Europe, could not do otherwise than support the action and do everything in their power to maintain the action taken by the Government.

Mr. EDWARD MORTON (Devonport) could not understand how the Under Secretary made out that at present there were 60,000 Christians under arms round Candia besieging the Mahomedan population in that town, seeing that according to the latest Blue Book the total number of Christian families in Crete all told was under 50,000. When the right hon. Gentleman said the people of Crete ought to remain quiet and trustful under the promises made to them by the Concert, he would call to his mind the fact that the people of Crete had been rebelling about every ten years ever since the freedom of Greece was originally secured, and that on every occasion promises had been made to them by the Great Powers, and on every occasion those promises had been broken. And all along the demand made by the people of Crete had been a demand for annexation to Greece and not for autonomy. He remembered his hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester in 1868 moving a Resolution in favour of the annexation of Crete to Greece. The insurrection in the island was then allayed owing to the promise of reforms which were never put into practice. So it was ten years later, and again in 1889, but the reforms were never carried out, owing to the bad faith of the Porte. Were not the Cretans now acting only in accordance with common sense in refusing to believe in the promises made to them? The Powers said they were going to give freedom and autonomy to Crete, but had they the power to carry it into effect? The experience of last year showed them that the Concert of Europe was controlled by two despotic Powers. If they wanted to do what was right he did not believe their Russian and German masters would allow them. The Concert of Europe had been the negation of international law. Hon. Members talked in the House and in the country as if the Concert of the six Powers constituted international law; he contended that it constituted the negation of that law. The only claim of the six Powers was that they had force behind them. It was a substitution of might for right. The Under Secretary told them that his Government and the Concert of Europe had given a Constitution to Crete. They had given a Constitution to Crete some eight different times, and it had never been realised. Why the reforms had not been carried out had never been explained yet. They had asked over and over again why this Constitution was not put in force in Crete, and they were first told that the difficulty in the way was the presence of the Greek troops. Next they were told that simultaneously on the withdrawal of the Greek troops the Turkish troops would go. They were next told that the Greeks must go first; and now, finally, they were only told that, if the Greek troops withdrew then the Turkish garrisons would be reduced. This seemed to be a programme in the wrong direction. What was the Power in the Concert which was preventing the Constitution for Crete being carried into law? The Concert was probably the strongest that ever existed in the history of the world. While it was so strong, it had been shown to be so evil. If they had decided that autonomy was to be given to Crete, and if that was not given, that showed that there was some Power which prevented it being given. When they asked a question on this subject in that House they were told by the Under Secretary that the Government had no information, and, therefore, they had to go elsewhere for information. It seemed to him that they were degraded to this position, that whereas England was in possession of no veto, Germany and Russia held a veto. We had none upon them. [Cheers.] He should like to know whether the Government were going to vouchsafe any information as to what it is going to do in the future? The Greeks, they were told, and the Turks were massed on the frontier; and they were told by Her Majesty's Government that both Powers had been informed that the aggressor would not be allowed to profit by war. Whatever else might be said about the Greek Government, it had not influenced the secret societies; and this was also clear, that, according to international law, the Power which had declared war was Turkey. He believed the country would hold the Government responsible for carrying out their pledge—that whoever might be the aggressor it would not profit by this war. Besides, the territory in Epirus and under the Berlin Treaty 20 years ago—this territory was given to Greece. They were entitled to say as against Her Majesty's Government, that the traditional policy of this country, with regard to insurgents struggling against foreign despots, had not been carried out on this occasion. When they were attempting, 20 years ago, or their predecessors were carrying out a similar policy, they were warned by the predecessors of those now on the Opposition Benches. He believed—for they remembered the incident at Crewe—that the same Nemesis which tracked the Beaconsfield Government would follow on the track of the present Government. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. EDWARD MOON (St. Pancras, N.) said that the hon. Member's doctrine of nationalities would have the strangest result if applied to the Transvaal. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member claimed that no sooner did Mr. Gladstone's Administration come into power than there was an enlargement of the Greek frontier. That was consequent on the Treaty of Berlin, and if the hon. Member had referred to the protocols, he would have found that Lord Salisbury asked that the Greek representatives might appear before the Berlin Congress and be heard. It had been said that if Russia had been allowed to act under the Treaty of San Stefano there would have been no Armenian massacres. But he challenged any hon. Member to point out massacres which had occurred in any part of the territory proposed to be taken by Russia under the Treaty of San Stefano.

MR. MORTON said that two of the places where the worst of the massacres occurred—the town of Bayazid and the Valley of Alashkeid—would have fallen into the hands of Russia, and Lord Beaconsfield boasted that he had succeeded in taking those two places out of the hands of Russia.

Mr. MOON said that, at any rate, those were but a small part of the massacres which had taken place, and the places referred to by the hon. Member were but a very small portion of the territory of which Russia was deprived by the Treaty of Berlin. The phrase, "integrity of the Ottoman Empire," had been a good deal commented on; but the fact that Lord Salisbury had referred to the Treaty of Berlin and the Treaty of Paris in one breath, showed that the integrity of the Ottoman Empire was not a thing which, in his opinion, could not be modified by agreement among the Great Powers. It was one of the merits of Lord Salisbury's Government that they had made that agreement a more perfect instrument for good. As M. Hanotaux had said at the time of the Armenian massacres, the Concert only existed on paper, it was a word; and that it had now become a fact was due to no one more than to Lord Salisbury. The hon. Member had said that the Balkan States had always been united against Turkey. History showed that many a time those States, when oppressed by Russia, had wished the Turks back again.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said he must condole with the Members of the Opposition on the dull character of the Debate. The hon. Member for Devonport, in a speech in the provinces, had said that he and Sir William Harcourt were going to smash up the Concert. He said there—

> "the Liberal Party were anxious to destroy the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and he was anxious and willing to smash the Concert of Europe."

Mr. MORTON said that he was referring to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, from which he was quoting.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said that he was condoling with the hon. Member on the absence of that tremendous onslaught on Her Majesty's Government which would result in the smashing up of the Concert. He himself was not fond of the Concert, and he was always glad when England stood outside, because he feared her being used for ends which were not English. But on this occasion he was unable to see what other course could have been pursued than to act with the Concert. The attacks made by the right hon. Member for Stirling on every individual Power were entirely undeserved. It was a cardinal principle of French policy to maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and, as had been pointed out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for the sake of European peace it was necessary to maintain the territorial integrity of Turkey. Not much had been said about Greece in the course of the Debate. Not one of the hundred Members who signed the ridiculous and insane telegram to Greece had announced his intention of joining the fighting; and the one hon. Member who had gone within reach of bullets had been treated with jeers which were not deserved. The Greeks were to prove themselves worthy descendants of their ancestors; and they had not even been able to get up a fight on the Græco-Turkish frontier. When the Turks came within less than 3,000 yards, away went the Greeks; and the greatest loss of life had been on the occasion when 500 Greeks were trampled to death by their own brethren in headlong flight. The Greeks had been thoroughly beaten, and the Turks were now in occupation up to their old frontier line. He hoped that the Concert would not intervene to rob the Turks now of their well-earned fruits of victory. The Turks had a right to an indemnity, to a retrocession of territory, and, above all, to the assumption by Greece of that portion of the debt which she was to assume when she took over Thessaly. It would be monstrous, and it would not be without danger, if at this moment, when the Turks were victorious, Europe should intervene to rob Turkey of the fruits of the war she had waged. Within the last fortnight hon. Members opposite had learned that the Turk was not the monster he was painted, that he was brave in battle and mild in victory—[cries of "Oh, oh!"]—that he was one of the best fighting men in Europe, one of the best disciplined, and one of those to be trusted to extend mercy to the conquered.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said that the Leader of the Opposition, who, as they knew, was absent through indisposition, was anxious to speak upon this question. He had therefore to ask whether the Government would be willing, if this Amendment were divided upon, to postpone the Vote provided they were allowed to make progress with other Votes of a not very contentious character. Personally he was anxious to take part in the Debate, especially after what had been said by the hon. Member for King's Lynn in respect to the telegram to the King of Greece, which he was afraid the hon. Gentleman had not even read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) understood the Leader of the Opposition did desire that there should be another opportunity of discussing the Foreign Office Vote. The Government were therefore prepared, as soon as the Amendment now before the Committee was disposed of, to postpone the Vote and make progress with other Votes. [" Hear, hear! "]

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 63; Noes, 169.—(Division List, No. 192.)

Original question again proposed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

On the return of the CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, after the usual interval,

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

> "That a sum, not exceeding £8,485, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses of the Offices of the House of Lords."

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said he did not take objection to any particular item of the Vote, but to the whole Vote. In the items he noticed the Department of the Lord Chancellor. Ireland had its own Lord Chancellor, and did not want to pay for an English Lord Chancellor. He had never heard that the Department of the Clerk of the Parliaments had done any service to Ireland. Then there was the Department of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. He could not understand the retention of this official in these days, and what benefit he conferred on the three kingdoms passed his comprehension. He had a great respect for the Librarian of the House of Lords, and thought that he rendered useful services, but of what use was the Department of the Lord Great Chamberlain? His objection, however, was to the whole Vote. As an Irish representative he contended that Ireland had no interest whatever in retaining the House of Lords; in fact, it was in their interest to get rid of it as quickly as possible. It had obstructed every Irish reform, and when it could not defeat their proposals for reform it had mutilated them and rendered them practically worthless. It was a useless institution from every point of view.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: It will not be possible for the hon. Member to discuss the position of the House of Lords upon the question of the salaries of the House of Lords officers. To get rid of the House of Lords legislation would be necessary, and as the hon. Member was well aware, they could not discuss legislation on dealing with Votes in Supply.

MR. CLANCY said he would not pursue that line of argument, but even from the English point of view he would point out that the House of Lords was a useless institution, for when he intended to make an important announcement he did not do so in the House of Lords, but in the habitation of the Primrose League. Of this sum of £14,485 Ireland paid a twelfth-part, and her taxable capacity had been established by the Report of a Royal Commission to be one-twentieth. Personally he would consent to Ireland paying her fair share for every sum voted by Parliament for Imperial purposes. During the last few weeks they had been treated in that House to an exhibiton of English injustice, which compelled him, as an Irish Member, to avail himself of every opportunity to protest against the excessive taxation which England imposed upon Ireland. If the Government had said they would consider what was the best mode of redressing this grievance his position would have been different, but the Government, through the Chancellor of the Exchequer, had denied the most patent facts. They had disregarded the authority of Lord Farrer and Lord Welby.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: I am afraid that the manner in which the hon. Member is now discussing the subject is not relevant to the Votes in Supply.

Mr. CLANCY said his vote, and possibly the votes of other Members, would be determined by the overtaxation of Ireland in connection with these Votes in Supply. That being so, he submitted that he was entitled to discuss whether Ireland was overtaxed or not, and to argue on that basis against the Votes.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: The hon. Member is justified in protesting and dividing against this Vote or any other, but I do not think discussion can take place in Supply on the overtaxation of Ireland. That is a separate matter, which would arise in Committee of Ways and Means or on other occasions, but not in Committee of Supply.

Mr. CLANCY said he was not attempting to discuss whether Ireland was overtaxed, but he was taking the contribution of Ireland to these Votes and the Report of the Financial Relations Commission as his text.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: That cannot be discussed on the Vote for the Offices of the House of Lords.

Mr. CLANCY said he would not, of course, contest the Chairman's ruling. His principal reason for opposing this Vote—and he hoped every Irish Member would oppose it on the same ground—was not on any paltry item or whether the House of Lords was a useless institution or not, but simply on the ground that Ireland was asked to contribute to the expenses of the offices of the House of Lords in undue proportion, and a grievance of the first magnitude was inflicted on his country. [Nationalist cheers.]

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES compared the expenses of the offices of the House of Lords with those of the House of Commons. While the latter cost £28,000 a year, the former cost £14,400. The disproportion between the two sums, when they considered the amount of work done by the two Houses, was monstrous. ["Hear, hear!"] If the House of Commons was rightly officered to the extent of £28,000 a year, the proportion spent on the House of Lords should be £4,000. He had no desire or intention to belittle the position and functions of the House of Lords in the affairs of the State. The Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House of Lords received £4,000 a year, and though the Speaker of the House of Commons had ten times as much to do, he only received £5,000. The number of hours he attended as Speaker of the House of Lords were extremely few, and his duties were extremely few and unimportant. He had no authority over the House of Lords. He was merely an accidental person on the Woolsack. He did not, and could not, give important rulings on points of order as the Speaker of the House of Commons did. He had none of the innumerable attributes of authority which had been committed to their Speaker. If the Speaker of the House of Commons properly received £5,000 a year, they ought to consider whether the salary of the Speaker of the other House should not be reduced to £2,000. But in addition to his £4,000 as Speaker of the House of Lords, the Lord Chancellor received £6,000 a year as President of the Supreme Court and the Court of Chancery, which was charged on the Consolidated Fund. In his own opinion no one who received a salary voted by the House of Commons should occupy any other position than that in respect of which the salary was voted. Otherwise he was a pluralist. But the Lord Chancellor had a third character as Speaker in the House of Lords. In that capacity he had made serious attacks on the independence and rights of the House of Commons. He would say nothing about judicial patronage, in the exercise of which he believed the Lord Chancellor was influenced neither by fear nor affection. [Laughter.] But as regarded his salary as Speaker of the House of Lords, he trusted the Secretary of the Treasury would take this case of pluralism and overpayment into consideration, and that next year the result would be an amicable and reasonable arrangement between the Treasury on the one hand and the Lord Chancellor on the other for the reduction of the Vote. But for his unalterable determination to support the Government in every possible way—[laughter]—he would move the reduction of the Vote. If, however, any other Member would move the reduction he would support him. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. DILLON entirely agreed with the views that had been so admirably expressed by the hon. Member for Lynn Regis. He thought the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords, when compared with the salaries paid to the officers of the House of Commons, were nothing short of a public scandal, and every available opportunity ought to be taken to direct the attention of the taxpayers of the country to the outrageous waste of public money which was going on from year to year in fixing the salaries of the officials in the other Chamber. No one could pretend that the work done by the Speaker of the House of Lords was worth £4,000 a year. Again, take the case of the Librarian of the House of Lords. That gentleman was paid £800 a year, while the assistant Librarian of the House of Commons, whose qualifications were well known to every hon. Member who used the Library, who did more work in one week than the Librarian of the House of Lords did in one year, only received £600 a year as the maximum. Was it not a gross scandal that they should pay £800 a year to a man for doing practically nothing, whereas they only gave £600 a year to one of their servants for working as hard as worked any official in the whole country? He considered the Secretary to the Treasury was bound to offer some explanation for such an absurd and monstrous difference in the salaries. If the Librarian of the House of Lords was to be paid £800 a year, then a fair salary for the Librarian of the House of Commons would be £10,000 a year. He objected to such a waste of the taxpayers' money, and he objected to the whole of the Vote for the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords, which he regarded as a worthless and mischievous institution. The one qualification which now secured a seat in that august assembly was wealth, and, that being so, he thought it would be a very reasonable thing, if the Members of the House of Lords considered themselves as a useful portion of the constitutional machinery of this country, that they should put their hands in their pockets and subscribe the expenses of their own officials. He did not believe the majority of the taxpayers considered the House of Lords a useful institution, and they ought not to be called upon to pay for their officers. He agreed with the hon. Member for North Dublin that this Vote was especially objectionable as regarded the taxpayers of Ireland, nine out of every ten of whom, if polled, would be found to be in favour of sweeping away the House of Lords altogether, regarding it as a purely mischievous institution. He therefore proposed that the Vote should be reduced by £10,000.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: I cannot put that. The whole sum asked for is only £8,000.

Mr. DILLON: Then I beg to move that it be reduced by the sum of £6,000.

Mr. MACNEILL was sorry the hon. Member for Lynn Regis had not evinced the courage of his convictions by moving the reduction personally on the one item of the Lord Chancellor's salary. He had himself some gratification in speaking on this Vote, inasmuch as the Gentleman who would defend it was his economic godfather, from whom he first learned the art of moving economic reductions. It must be recollected that the Speaker of the House of Lords was nothing more and nothing less than a Government official. He was appointed by and went out with the Government. Again, the Speaker of the House of Lords would not have the smallest authority to call any Member of that House to order, or control its proceedings in any way. Furthermore, he need not be a Peer or Member of the House of Lords at all; the place where he sat, on the Woolsack, was technically outside the House of Lords, and many Gentlemen had the use of the House of Lords who were not Peers at all, and never had been Peers. Vice Chancellor Leach, who presided for a considerable time over the House of Lords, was never a Peer, and got no money for it. There were many gentlemen of judicial eminence in the House of Lords, who would, of course, gladly take, for the honour of the position, the ten or fifteen minutes' duties four times in the week which that position involved. It was simply a profligate waste of public money to give a gentleman £4,000 a year for filling the post, even if he had no other, but when coupled with the fact that he got £6,000 a year for the discharge of judicial functions, it became really a gross public scandal. Why, he asked, should not the office of Speaker of the House of Lords be absolutely distinct from that of the Lord Chancellor, and the salary of the Speaker be reduced to £2,000 or £2,500 a year, which would be a handsome remuneration for the work performed, more especially as the duties were non-responsible? He should also like to see the Speaker of the House of Lords assume an absolutely non-political character. He should be there from Parliament to Parliament, just like the Speaker of the House of Commons, and should be elected by the Lords themselves. He objected to this salary because it was an inflated salary, a wrong, and improper, and because it was likewise unconstitutional when the office was of a political and partisan character. Then the Serjeant-at-Arms in attendance on the Lord Chancellor received £1,500 a year for, practically, issuing tickets to ladies for admission to the House of Lords. He was sure that any half-pay officer would be willing to undertake the duty at £200 or £300 a year. This was all Imperial taxation for which Ireland had to pay her quota, although she got no benefit in any way whatever. The messenger to the Lord Chancellor received £100 a year. It was only a small item, but it showed the waste that was going on. He thought the whole system was one of gross and extravagant waste. The money which was going in this way was simply ground out of the vitals of the poor to support this institution.

Mr. J. A. RENTOUL (Down, E.) ventured to point out that the total salary of the Lord Chancellor was £10,000 a year. He received £4,000 nominally as Speaker of the House of Lords, but whether it was divided or not in that way the fact remained that the salary of the Lord Chancellor was £10,000 a year. The Lord Chief Justice had a salary of £8,000, but he was only second in command, while the Lord Chancellor was the head of the legal profession, and, considering how difficult it was in a large and great profession of 9,000 members to become Lord Chancellor, he thought a salary of £10,000 was little enough. The hon. and learned Member for Donegal seemed to make it a matter of complaint that the House of Lords only sat for a few minutes on four days of the week. He would remind the hon. Member that the House of Lords had just as much business to do as the House of Commons, but they did their business seriously and soberly, and got through their work expeditously.

They were to be commended for this, and not censured.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston) said that the principle which he and the hon. Member for Lynn Regis advocated on the occasion on which they defeated the late Government on this Vote was that the salaries of the officials of the two Houses should be placed on terms of equality. To the opinion he expressed then he still adhered. He thought there could be no justification whatever for the salaries of the officials of the House of Lords being based on a higher scale than those of the officials of the House of Commons; and he was glad to say that that was also the opinion of the House of Lords itself, so far as he was able to gather from the Report of the Committee on the subject. Since that time great reductions had taken place with regard to the scale upon which all future officials of the House of Lords would be remunerated, and already considerable alterations had taken place. In fact, he was not quite sure whether, at the present moment, the salaries of the officials of the House of Commons were not, on the average, somewhat higher than those of the House of Lords. He did not say whether they ought to be or not, but what they contended for in the past was equality. The hon. Member for East Mayo referred especially to the case of the Librarian, but he thought his comparison between the Assistant Librarian of the House of Commons and the Chief Librarian of the House of Lords was hardly a fair one. He ought to have mentioned that the Chief Librarian of the House of Lords got £800 and certain rooms which he was under an obligation to give up at any time he was required in consideration of an addition of £200 to his salary. His salary, therefore, was really £1,000 and not £800. The hon. Member ought to have compared the salary of the Librarian of the House of Lords at £1,000, with the salary of the Librarian of the House of Commons at £1,200. He thought he should be able to show that, with regard to the principal Clerks at the Table of the House, and with regard to the higher officials, the House of Commons' scale was a higher one than that of the House of Lords. The principal attack on this Vote was with regard to the salary of the Lord Chancellor. Undoubtedly all legal salaries were on a somewhat high scale. They paid their legal officers in the House of Commons, very properly, on a very much higher scale than they paid the ordinary layman—[laughter]—but he thought it was only fair to recollect, as the hon. Member for East Down had stated, that the Lord Chancellor, after all, was the head of the legal profession in this country, and that his combined salary of £10,000 was very little above that of the Lord Chief Justice, with the duties of the Speaker of the House of Lords thrown in. But his salary was attacked as Speaker of the House of Lords. His salary in that respect was not so large as that of the Speaker of the House of Commons, though his duties strictly as Speaker in the other House were not perhaps so arduous; but, while £4,000 was a large salary, he did not say it was too large for the work done. But what were the facts of the case? He did not admit the Lord Chancellor's £10,000 was too much for the combined duties, but even if he were to admit it, they would still be bound by Act of Parliament. His hon. Friend was mistaken in supposing that, even if they were to reduce the salary of the Lord Chancellor as Speaker of the House of Lords, they would in any way affect his total salary. The Lord Chancellor received £10,0000 a year under two statutes of 1851 and 1852. Under those statutes he was entitled to receive "the net yearly sum of £10,000," whether he got paid as Speaker of the House of Lords or not. The only result of £4,000 being charged on the House of Lords was that, instead of £10,000, only £6,000 was charged on the Consolidated Fund, and that the House of Commons was afforded an opportunity of criticism. This £10,000 was a stautory charge, and it was not within their power, when discussing the Estimates, to reduce the Lord Chancellor's emoluments.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) supported the reduction. The Irish Members were interested in this Vote to the extent of £1,500, and he complained that the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod should receive £1,000 in addition to a military pension of £994 as Colonel Commandant of the Royal Artillery. This, from a democratic point of view, constituted a very grave scandal. Then the Yeoman Usher of the Black Rod received £300, in addition to £200 as Secretary to the Lord Great Chamberlain; and he thought that on inquiry it would be found that the duties of the office were performed more by the last named than by the former. He supported the Amendment of the hon. Member.

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he could not support the reduction as moved, but suggested that it should be altered to one of £4,000, because whether the Committee voted this £6,000 or not the Lord Chancellor would still receive his £10,000 a year out of the Consolidated Fund. His right hon. Friend justified the Lord Chancellor's salary on the ground that it was a legal salary. Yes, but legal salaries were scandalously high. If the Committee looked at the salaries of the Attorney General and the Solicitor General in addition to the salary of the Lord Chancellor, he thought it would be impossible for hon. Members to escape the conviction that the salaries were ridiculously high and furnished no kind of justification for keeping up the Lord Chancellor's salary if it be, as he contended, in itself too high. When his right hon. Friend said that the salary was provided for under Act of Parliament he was afraid that he had been misled by some of his subordinates at the Treasury who were very ignorant of the law. [Laughter.] They gave off-hand opinions as to statutes of which they knew nothing, and which did not exist even. He called attention to the salaries of the Serjeant-at-Arms in both Houses, and drew a picture of the patient figure in the House of Commons sitting night after night in his chair, without leaving it for necessary refreshment, while the same official in the House of Lords, after a few minutes' service joined his domestic circle and participated in its enjoyments. [Laughter.] The salary of the Serjeant-at-Arms in the House of Lords was £1,596, or £396 more than the Serjeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons received. When the duties of the two officials were contrasted it was obviously monstrous that there should be this difference between their salaries.

*Mr. HANBURY said that the next holder of the office of Serjeant-at-Arms in the House of Lords would only receive £1,000. He did not suppose that his right hon. Friend would wish to reduce the salary of the present official.

*Mr. GIBSON BOWLES said he was quite satisfied with that statement.

Mr. DILLON regretted that he could not comply with the hon. Member's suggestion that he should modify his Amendment. If he were to alter it in the way suggested it would not adequately represent the views which he entertained with regard to the House of Lords.

Mr. MACNEILL hoped that the refreshment rooms in the House of Lords would be placed at the disposal of the House of Commons on occasions when there was a specially large muster of Members. The refreshment rooms in the House of Lords were hardly ever used from year's end to year's end. In 1893, when a great number of Members were in attendance in that House the accommodation in the dining rooms was totally insufficient, and Mr. Shaw Lefevre applied to the authorities in whom was vested the control of the refreshment rooms in the House of Lords to allow those rooms to be used by the Members of the House of Commons when the House of Lords was not sitting, and the request was refused. As the House of Commons voted a certain amount in respect of these rooms, he trusted that in future the Members of the House of Commons would be allowed to use them when they were crowded in their own House.

Mr. J. DALY (Monaghan, S.) thought it must be very disagreeable to the Secretary to the Treasury to have to defend this Vote. He should himself have preferred a Motion for the abolition of the House of Lords rather than one for reducing the salaries of the officials of that House. However, the Irish Members had no sympathy with the House of Lords, and having no sympathy with the masters they could scarcely have any sympathy with the servants. The House of Lords had ever been the stumbling-block in the way of beneficial legislation for Ireland—

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: I have already pointed out that, in order to get rid of the House of Lords, legislation would be required, and in accordance with a well known rule you cannot discuss what is a subject for legislation in the course of Debates in Supply.

Mr. DALY said he, of course, accepted the ruling of the Chair, and would not pursue that point. It had been said that the officials of the House of Lords had not very high salaries. Might he in that connection compare the salary of the Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords with that of the Chairman of Committees in the House of Commons? In the House of Lords the Chairman of Committees received £2,500 a year for taking the Chair for half-an-hour now and then, whereas he had known the Chairman of Committees in the House of Commons to be in the Chair for 12, 15, and even 24 hours—[laughter]—while he only got the paltry sum of £2,000. If there was anything unfair in the Vote it was the salary of the Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords. The hon. Member for East Down took the part of the Lord Chancellor, and compared his position with that of the Lord Chief Justice of England. That was a ridiculous comparison. The Lord Chancellor had to attend the House of Lords for a few hours daily, while the Lord Chief Justice had to attend in Court day after day, and also to go on Circuit. He had never heard a legal gentleman support a proposal to cut down the salary of a legal official. He objected to the Vote on the part of Ireland, who had to pay her share. On that ground he should support the Amendment, and he would appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury to allow the Vote to be reduced for the sake of old days. [A laugh.]

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said he intended to vote for the Amendment. It appeared that the scale of salaries in the House of Lords was higher in many instances than that in the House of Commons, but he understood that that was so because it had not been deemed advisable to reduce the salaries of existing holders of office, and that in future the salaries would not be above the scale paid in the House of Commons. As to the case of the Lord Chancellor, he thought there was a great deal to be said for the view taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. The Lord Chancellor had much more important duties to perform than those of Speaker of the House of Lords. ["Hear, hear!"] He was the head of the Supreme Court, and taking the scale of salary paid to the Judges, he did not think that £10,000 a year was excessive. ["Hear, hear!"] He knew that in other countries the salaries of judicial officers were much lower than in England, but he was not sure that it was a wise policy to pay low salaries to men occupying judicial and official positions. He was going to vote in favour of the Amendment, however, not because he was in favour of a niggardly and cheeseparing policy. If he were an English Member he would certainly support the Vote. But although he was a Member of this Parliament, he was not an English representative, and although he was in this Parliament, he could scarcely call himself of it. He was there to represent a distinct interest, and of every shilling voted on every Estimate that came before the House, Ireland was called upon to pay more than her fair share, and on that broad ground, and apart altogether from the arguments that had been advanced, he should vote in favour of the Amendment, and, as far as it was in his power to do so, against every shilling that was asked for for the public service of this country. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. MACNEILL wished to have some information with regard to the Lord Great Chamberlain, whose Department cost very close upon £5,000 a year. The Lord Great Chamberlain seemed to have as many domestic servants as King Solomon himself. Ireland was interested in this matter in the proportion of two shares to 17.

*MR. HANBURY said there was no charge for the Lord Great Chamberlain on this Vote at all. The Lord Great Chamberlain was responsible for the care of the Houses of Parliament, and it was simply for the officials under him, cleaners, housekeepers, and so forth, who had to carry out the duties and arrangements of the Palace of Westminster, that the charges set forth in the Vote were made.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES called attention to the number of persons in the House of Lords who enjoyed more than one salary. These included the messenger to the Crown Office, the clerk to the Examiner of Standing Orders, the messenger to ditto, and the clerk of printed papers. He felt bound to call attention to the monstrous system of pluralism of offices which obtained all through these Votes. When a man was in the public service he ought not to receive pay and allowances from the public in another capacity; it ought to be a recognised principle that the whole of his time and service in the capacity in which he was admitted to the public service belonged to the public. The present system was extremely mischievous, and tended both to the demoralisation of the public service and the unnecessary increase of public expense.

Question put, "That a sum, not exceeding £2,485, be granted for the said Service."

Original Question put:—The Committee divided:—Ayes, 162; Noes, 39. —(Division List, No. 194.)

2. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,074, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council."

MR. CLANCY said he opposed this Vote on the same ground on which he opposed the last, and on which he intended to oppose every Vote submitted to the Committee. [A laugh.] He believed that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council discharged their duties in a most satisfactory manner, but as an Irish representative he refused to vote a single penny in aid of the service the Committee rendered. In consequence of the action of the Government upon the financial question, in consequence of their attempt to throw ridicule upon the Royal Commission, and in consequence of their proposal to appoint another Commission to bring in a verdict for them—

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: That question does not arise on the Privy Council Vote.

MR. CLANCY said that was his reason at all events. [Laughter.] He did not understand the laughter of hon. Gentlemen, but perhaps they would laugh the other way at the end of the Session, or at the end of this Sitting, if every Irish Member carried out the policy which he intended to pursue, namely, to obstruct every Vote submitted—

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: If the hon. Gentleman avows that his only object in speaking is obstruction, I am afraid I shall have to put the more severe Rules of the House in force against him. [Cheers.]

MR. CLANCY said he had no intention of disguising his intentions. In his opinion any means that were open to them, whether within the Rules of Order or without the Rules of Order - [laughter]—

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: The hon. Member is not confining himself to the Vote before the House, and I must ask him to resume his seat. [Cheers.]

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that £1,700 was set down as the salary of the Clerk of the Council. In former times the Privy Council was the most important body in the State, and the business of the Clerk was to keep a book which formed a permanent record of the advice given to the Sovereign and of the grounds upon which the advice was based. It was that book alone which enabled the House to impeach a Minister for any misdoing. Now, however, the Privy Council had substantially ceased to exist. There was what was called a Committee of the Privy Council, which consisted of Cabinet Ministers, but no record of their proceedings was kept. As the office of Clerk was, therefore, a purely nominal one, £1,700 a year was far too large a salary to pay. He moved, "That item A (Salaries), be reduced by £700, in respect of the salary of the Clerk of the Council."

MR. MACNEILL said there was no record of the proceedings of the Privy Council, whose members were sworn to inviolable secresy, and this clerkship was merely a means of giving outdoor relief to some supporter or stalwart of one Government or another. He desired to know for what service the Clerk of the Council was paid £1,700. He was unable to see from the Estimate whether the salary was appropriated to the Privy Council in its judicial, its administrative, or its consultative capacity. He believed it was appropriated to the Council in its consultative capacity; and, if that were so, he declared, as a matter of fact, that the Clerk did nothing to earn the salary. He toiled not, he wrote not, and he reaped a golden harvest, but he had not the satisfaction of reaping it with the sweat of his brow.

*MR. HANBURY said that while in some respects the duties of the Clerk of the Council had diminished, in other respects they had increased. The salary of the Clerk was made up of two items—£200 for attendance on Her Majesty, and £1,500 as Clerk of the Council. Formerly there used to be four Clerks, but, as the work of the Council decreased, so the number had been reduced until now there was only one.

*MR. GIBSON BOWLES said his right hon. Friend must have been misinformed by some subordinate when he said that Orders in Council were prepared by the Clerk of the Council. As a matter of fact, every Order in Council was drawn up by the Department to which it referred. He knew as a matter of personal knowledge that a certain Order in Council in regard to the rule of the road at sea was drawn up by some second division Clerk of the Board of Trade.

MR. WALTER HAZELL (Leicester) said it was very difficult, if not impossible, for the Committee to discuss fairly and adequately the duties of offices such as the office of Clerk of the Council. He thought there should be a permanent Committee of the House to investigate the duties and emoluments of every office when it became vacant, and recommend to the House such changes as it thought fit in regard to those duties and emoluments.

MR. MACNEILL said he desired to again repeat that the Clerk of the Council got £1,700 a year for doing nothing, and he had five or six assistants to help him in doing nothing. The item of £200 to which the Secretary of the Treasury had referred as being paid to the Clerk of the Council was the method of paying the Clerk of the Council's travelling expenses from Whitehall on a Saturday afternoon down to the Isle of Wight or Windsor on the rare occasions on which there were Privy Councillors to be sworn in and Her Majesty was present at the Council. This office was a sinecure, and a gross and corrupt job. He remembered they used to say at college that the best proctor was he who had been the most notorious scamp in his younger days. [Laughter.] That was not the only office in which that principle had been applied. He would study Hanbury in "Hansard" in order to learn how to attack this item, but in the meantime perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would give them an official answer, to which they might listen with entertainment and instruction.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 46; Noes, 167.—(Division List, No. 195.)

Mr. MACNEILL moved:—

"That Item A (Salaries) be reduced by £1,142, in respect of the salary of the Deputy Clerk of the Council and the Chief Clerk."

He said this gentleman did nothing, and assisted another, getting £1,700 a year to do nothing. He hoped that in these matters the Irish Members would have assistance from English Radical Members. The discussions should not fall entirely on the former.

Mr. ALBERT SPICER (Monmouth Boroughs) asked the Secretary to the Treasury whose duty it was to report periodically to the Treasury whether these positions in connection with the Privy Council were still necessary to the public service?

Mr. HAZELL asked whether, if this particular office in some way came to an end, the right hon. Gentleman would consider it necessary, in the public service, that another gentleman should be appointed?

*Mr. HANBURY observed that, in order to show the careful control exercised, partly by the Lord President of the Council and partly by the Treasury, over this Vote, he had stated, in reply to the last Amendment, that these clerks had gradually been cut down as the work had decreased. A careful eye was kept over the Estimate with a view to the possibility of reduction on vacancies occurring.

Mr. SPICER said the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the question who was responsible, on the part of the Privy Council, for informing the Treasury that every one of these officers was still necessary for the public service?

*Mr. HANBURY replied that the head of the Department—the Duke of Devonshire—was responsible for sending in the Estimate.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL pointed out that there was an increase in the Vote this year as compared with last year. In the previous year it was £1,117, whilst this year it was £1,142. Was it by a Treasury Minute that the increase took place?

*Mr. HANBURY: An annual increment of £25 has accrued. This officer was appointed upon a certain scale of salary. When the appointment was made the scale was based upon the idea that he was to have an annual increment, and he has to get what was promised him when he took the place.

Mr. T. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield) asked if these were two distinct offices occupied by one gentleman?

*Mr. HANBURY: Yes; this is indicated in the column headed "Numbers." He has duties of his own to preform as Chief Clerk, and in the absence of the Clerk of the Council he takes his place.

Mr. BAYLEY thought it would have been a great deal better if the Estimate had stated that.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) remarked that the right hon. Gentleman had told them the number of reductions of the clerks, but that referred to Clerks of the Council. He saw that, taking out this gentleman with the two offices, they should still have left one senior clerk, one junior clerk, one clerk of the second division, and two clerks of the second division. Surely that was enough staff to assist a gentleman who was doing nothing?

*MR. HANBURY: I beg to move, "That the question be now put."

Question put accordingly.

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 43; Noes, 168.—(Division List, No. 197.)

*MR. HANBURY claimed to move "That the original Question be now put."

And, it being after Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

GREECE AND THE POWERS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I wish to ask the noble Marquess a Question of which I have given him private notice—whether it is true that the Greek Government have announced their intention to withdraw their troops from Crete, and whether it is true that they have asked the Powers to mediate between them and the Turkish Government?

*THE PRIME MINISTER (The MARQUESS of SALISBURY): If I were to answer the noble Earl in the negative to both Questions I should be strictly accurate, but yet I might mislead him; and therefore I will give one word in explanation. The Greek Government have not asked for mediation, but the members of the Greek Government have expressed a desire for it, and I do not think the Greek Government intend officially, as a whole, to ask for it. With respect to Crete, there is the same indefiniteness in the present state of things. The Greek Government do not conceive it to be consistent, as I gather, with their position, to promise the immediate or definite withdrawal of the troops. But I understand, though we have not got absolutely official confirmation of it, they are prepared to say that they will withdraw them in the future, and at no very distant future. I am sorry to say that, as we stand at present, I do not think that this assurance entirely satisfies all the Powers. However, I have only to answer for ourselves, and our instructions have been to join in any procedure for the purpose of entering on mediation which is acceptable to the others. In our view the main point is, if possible, to arrest the effusion of blood, and we are not very particular about forms. That is all I can say at present. I regret exceedingly that the Greek Government is more particular about forms than I think the circumstances of the case justify. [Cheers.]

JURIES DETENTION BILL.

LORD COLERIDGE moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which, in his opinion, was a humble but useful Measure. It proposed to do away with the distinction in the treatment of jurors in cases of felony and in cases of misdemeanour. No one could now discern the distinction between those two classes of cases. Whatever history might say, at present some of the gravest crimes were misdemeanours, and some of the most paltry crimes were felonies. But in the case of the trial of felonies, however paltry the crime, when once the jury had been sworn they must be kept together until they discharged themselves by giving a verdict. This was not the case in questions of misdemeanour. The result was inconvenient in the administration of justice, because, as the afternoon approached, it was impossible to take felonies lest they should last over the day. Or, if they were taken, the trial was very often prolonged to such an extent that the jurors became fatigued. He did not understand how justice could be advanced by such a barbarous and old-fashiond method of procedure; and he thought that the ancient distinction should be given up. Probably the language of the Bill required amendment in some particulars; but in point of principle he recommended the Bill to the favourable consideration of the House.

*THE LORD CHIEF JUSTICE (Lord RUSSELL of KILLOWEN) said that there were few men connected with the administration of criminal justice who did not feel the need for this reform. Before, however, this Bill could be effective for real good, it would have to be materially altered from the form in which it had reached the House. It would be within the recollection of many of their Lordships that cases had occurred in which, had it been necessary to arraign a prisoner on the charge of felony, it would have been impossible to try him satisfactorily. The celebrated Tichborne case was an illustration. Fortunately the ends of justice were achieved by indicting the prisoner for misdemeanour, under which he got a very considerable sentence of imprisonment. But had it been necessary to make the experiment of indicting him for the felony of forging the Tichborne bonds, the experiment must have broken down, as it would have been impossible to get a jury secluded from their business and homes for 50 or more days. The restriction of the discretionary power of the Judge to allow a jury to separate simply for the purposes of refreshment or rest was wholly inadequate. Sir H. Poland had pointed out that this limitation would be a most unfortunate one. In the middle of the trial the Judge might be taken ill, or might be compelled to adjourn for the purpose of the attendance of a witness; or other circumstances might make it reasonable that the jury, or some of them, should be allowed a brief interval to go to their homes. None of these cases would be covered by the language of the Bill as it stood. As to the objection against giving this discretionary power to the Judge, he thought the short answer to it was this—that, if there were cases in which it was right that the jury should be allowed to separate, and cases in which it would not be proper, he could not see who was to exercise the discretion unless it were the Judge who had all the circumstances before him. Little as the Judges cared to have increased discretionary power, he did not think this was a case in which they ought to shrink from the exercise of that power. There were some, and he believed the Lord Chancellor was among them, who would exclude murder and treason cases from the purview of the Bill; but those were crimes which, althought serious, infinitely varied in their character; and if it were proper to give the Judge discretion at all, it would be proper to give it in those cases just as in any others.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (LORD HALSBURY) entirely agreed that some alteration of the law was proper at the present time; and, further, that the limitations which had been alluded to would make the Bill of no use at all. It was quite true that there were some misdemeanours very grave and some felonies very trivial, and therefore he would be disposed to say that the true distinction ought to be between cases which were very grave and those which were very trivial. He could not help thinking that when the time came it would be a serious matter for the House to consider whether or not on trial by jury of a person whose life was at stake, and who was possessed of considerable means, it would be desirable to leave the discretion to the Judge rather than to make it part of the law. It might be worth everything to the person to procure disagreement among the jury; and he might cause the jury to be shadowed in some way or other, in order that by the expenditure of a large sum of money he might bring about such a disagreement. The possibility of such a temptation ought not to be presented. But that was a point which could more properly be discussed in Committee. The reason why he would object to leave it to the discretion of a Judge was, not that he in the least questioned the impartiality of the exercise of the discretion, but that it would be invidious for a Judge to say, "In this case I will allow the jury to separate, and in another, I will not." When the Bill got into Committee, he would move Amendments directed to this and other points. At present the only question was whether the Bill should be read a Second time; and as he entirely agreed with the general object of the Bill, he supported the Second Reading.

LORD HERSCHELL said that he agreed that the Bill should be read a Second time, and that in Committee it would require consideration. The point mainly was whether they should in all cases leave it to the discretion of the Judge, or whether there was a certain class of cases in which the present system should continue. He did not intend to express an opinion about it, although he did not see that there would be serious objection to excluding cases of murder from the scope of the Bill.

Read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

NAVY AND MARINES (WILLS) ACT (1865) AMENDMENT BILL.

*THE EARL OF HOPETOUN moved the Second Reading of this Bill. It was intended to exempt the wills of naval pensioners from the operation of Section 5 of the Act of 1865, and also to allow a solicitor, or in Scotland a law agent, to act as an attesting witness under conditions set forth, thereby giving the men a larger freedom of choice without in any way depriving them of the protection which the Act afforded them.

Read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

LAND TRANSFER BILL. [H.L.].

Amendments reported (according to Order), and Bill to be read 3ª To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIME MINISTER (DUAL OFFICES).

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) gave notice that on an early day he would call attention to the anomalous position of Lord Salisbury as Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and to the severance of the office of First Lord of the Treasury from the Leadership of the Government, and should move:—

> "That, in the opinion of this House, the union in one individual of the offices of Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs introduces a fundamental change in the work of the foreign policy of the United Kingdom, and is a rupture of an old-established and invariable practice of the greatest importance to the good conduct of the public affairs of this country."

QUESTIONS.

WATER SUPPLY (RIVER NETHY).

Mr. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid): On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty (Mr. J. G. Weir), I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, having regard to the fact that the water of the River Nethy, in the Badenoch district of Inverness-shire, has been rendered unfit for drinking purposes by the discharge of sewage from several lodges and large farms above the village of Causer within the last 20 years, he will state why the Local Government Board for Scotland have failed to require the local authority to take action against those who are responsible for the pollution of the water of the river; whether he is aware that the local authority has taken action to compel the villagers, who for years have been dependent on the River Nethy for drinking water, to supply the village with water from another source a mile distant; and whether the Local Government Board for Scotland will require the local authority to take steps to free the water of the River Nethy from pollution?

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): The Local Government Board have frequently had under consideration the question of the water supply of the village of Causer. They have urged the local authority to take steps to provide a proper supply, and the local authority have taken proceedings against the inhabitants with this object. The Local Government Board have not required the local authority to take steps to have the river freed from pollution, as the Board have no power to do so. Moreover, it is not certain that the river can be made a suitable source of supply.

PENSIONS COMMUTATION BOARD.

Mr. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, having regard to the fact that the tables of the Pensions Commutation Board which were promulgated immediately after the passing of the Pensions Commutation Act of 1871, when 3 per cent. Consols stood at 92¾, have not been once revised, although 2¾ per cent. Consols now stand over 112, he will consider the advisability of seeking powers such as will enable the Pensions Commutation Board to render the tables more in accord with the present value of money?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The reduction of the rate of interest on which these tables are based can only be effected by legislation, and I am not prepared to recommend such legislation to Parliament. No public interest would be served by the grant of increased facilities for commutation.

POSTAL FACILITIES (ISLAND OF LEWIS).

MR. CALDWELL: On behalf of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty, I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the people of the townships of Cleascro, Achmore, and Lochganvich, Island of Lewis, suffer serious inconvenience in consequence of his Department having failed to establish a post office in the district as a place of call for correspondence; will he explain why, on the 7th January last, he renewed his suggestion that the persons affected should agree together to put up a roadside box on the route of the Stornoway and Callanish mail into which the driver could deliver letters; whether he is aware that this suggestion does not commend itself to the people of the district, inasmuch as its adoption, apart from the cost of the box, would involve the manufacture of upwards of 50 keys for the use of the various heads of families, each of whom would have access to his neighbours' correspondence; whether he will again consider the advisability of establishing a post office, such as would not only be a place of call for letters, but would also provide the inhabitants of the district with facilities for obtaining stamps, etc., and for posting letters; and whether he will state the cost of a post office of this description?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): In giving effect to the postal reforms announced in the Budget Speech, the Postmaster General hopes to be able at an early date to bring the neighbourhood in question within the official delivery, which will be a more convenient arrangement to the inhabitants than the establishment of the proposed office of call. The postman who delivers the letters will receive at the same time any letters for the post, and will also sell stamps.

GAMBLING IN FUTURES AND OPTIONS.

MR. J. L. CAREW (Dublin, College Green): On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin, St. Patrick (Mr. W. FIELD), I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture, the National Agricultural Union, the Farmers' Club, and other influential societies have all passed resolutions asking the Government to appoint a special Commission to inquire into and report on the effect of gambling in futures on agriculture and trade; and whether such a Commission will be appointed at an early date?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): I have received copies of resolutions of the nature indicated by the hon. Member which have been passed by a number of societies, chiefly connected with agriculture. I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by the appointment of a Commission.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS ACT.

MR. T. G. ASHTON (Beds, Luton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Education Department will sanction the appointment of teachers of schools which are attached to associations formed under the Voluntary Schools Act to be members of the governing body of such associations?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): The Committee of Council would not refuse to sanction such an appointment.

EDUCATION (HALF-TIME SCHOLARS).

*MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether Her Majesty's Government propose to introduce this Session any legislation to raise the age for half-time labour in accordance with the pledges given at the Berlin Conference?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not think there is any chance of legislation, such as that proposed by my hon. Friend, being introduced during the present Session.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION (IRELAND).

MR. CAREW: On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin, St. Patrick, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he intends at an early date to introduce the promised Measure to amend the existing system of Private Bill legislation for Ireland?

MR. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has yet come to any decision in reference to the introduction of a Measure to reform the system of Private Bill legislation so far as concerns Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I can only say that the prospect of the Bill for amending the system of Private Bill legislation for Ireland being introduced during the present Session must depend on the progress of public business generally.

TUSKAR LIGHT (TELEPHONIC COMMUNICATION).

MR. GEOFFREY DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the telephone communication with the Tuskar Light is under the control of the Post Office; whether any application has been received from the Liverpool Steam Shipowners' Association representing the advantage it would be to the shipping trade if vessels passing the Tuskar Light, and signalling, could be promptly reported; and whether arrangements could be made with the Irish Light Commissioners so that the telephone may be used for that purpose?

*MR. HANBURY: The telephone communication with the Tuskar Lighthouse is not under the control of the Post Office. It was provided, and it is maintained, by the Post Office, but at the cost of the Board of Trade. An application from the Liverpool Steam Shipowners' Association to the effect stated by the hon. Member was received by the Postmaster General, and was referred to the Board of Trade. The Postmaster General is informed by the Board of Trade that the whole question of commercial signalling from lighthouses electrically connected with the shore is under consideration.

CYCLING IN HYDE PARK.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works (1) if he can prevail upon His Royal Highness the Ranger of Hyde Park to extend the time for bicycles from 12 noon till 1 p.m., having regard to the fact that there is but little increase in traffic in that hour; and (2) in any case, if persons using the boats on the Serpentine can be allowed to push their cycles from the boathouse to the Victoria Road within that hour?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I do not see my way to adopt the suggestion made in the first part of my hon. Friend's Question; but I will instruct the police to use their discretion in interpreting the rule with reference to the cases indicated by him in the second portion of the Question.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

MR. E. BOULNOIS (Marylebone, E.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether space for erecting seats from which to view the Jubilee procession has been granted to the County Council and the Vestries of the county of London, but not to the Justices of the county; and whether the Justices will receive the same privilege, for the purpose of erecting at their own cost a stand to enable them to view the Jubilee procession?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: Yes, Sir; I have placed a site for a stand at the disposal of the London County Council, who have undertaken to provide, as far as possible, for the Vestries; but I am sorry to say that I am not able to provide space for the county Justices or any other bodies.

MR. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the interests of the public safety, special precautions will be taken to guard against the hasty erection of stands along the route of the Jubilee procession; and whether it is intended to insist on all such stands being officially inspected and strictly limited to a prescribed number of occupants?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): This is a matter with which the County Council have power to deal, except in regard to the portion of the route that lies within the City, under the London Building Act of 1894. The Council have given notice by advertisement, placard, and in other ways, that temporary structures cannot be erected without their consent, and that balconies intended to be used on the day should be properly shored up. They have also made arrangements for the examination of plans of such structures and for proper supervision being exercised over their erection. Tools and materials will be kept in readiness at certain points for dealing promptly with any dangerous structure. Similar precautions will doubtless also be taken by the City authorities.

PARIS FIRE (SAFETY OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS).

MR. J. AIRD (Paddington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, having regard to the terrible calamity in Paris, he will be willing to appoint a Committee or a Commission to consider the desirability of some further measures being taken for the safety of the public in this country, not only for theatres, but for public meetings and bazaars?

*MR. T. G. FARDELL (Paddington, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the Question I desire to supplement it with another, of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he will consider during the Parliamentary Recess the advisability of introducing in the course of the next Session of Parliament a Bill to give effect to the Report of the Select Committee of the House in 1892 on Theatres and places of Entertainment, and so extend the provisions of the Bill as to bring within its scope all places, whether licensed or not, which are used or intended to be used for any purpose where the public are invited to assemble?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: This very important Question has already been considered by more than one Committee, including the Select Committee of 1892, to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Paddington alludes, and I cannot say that at present it seems to me to be necessary to have a further Inquiry. I will carefully consider, however, the question of whether any or what legislation can be introduced further on with the view of securing the public, so far as may be possible, against the occurrence of any such terrible disaster as happened last week in Paris.

MR. AIRD: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that at the present time there is no control whatever as regards inspection of bazaars against fires?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I am quite aware that there is no control except over places which happen to be licensed for other purposes, when it is possible to attach to the licence a condition which insures some security for life against fire. It is a very difficult question upon which to legislate, but looking at the information which we have, and which has been supplied by the various Committees of Inquiry, I cannot see that at present there is any necessity for further investigation. That there ought to be some legislation I think is very possible, and to that I am prepared to give my most earnest attention. ["Hear, hear!"]

LINKED-BATTALION SYSTEM.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War to what extent the linked-battalion system is now disorganised by both battalions of an increasing number of groups being abroad at the same time?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): At present seven regiments have both battalions abroad.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that Resolutions have been passed by the Carrickmacross Board of Guardians and Carrickmacross Town Commissioners requesting the Great Northern Railway Company to run third-class passenger carriages on the mail train leaving Dublin at 6 a.m. for Belfast, and that a train for mails and passengers be run from Dundalk for Enniskillen at 7.21 a.m. on arrival of the mail train from Dublin; whether he is aware that other railway companies in Ireland are running third-class passenger carriages on their mail trains; and what course he intends to take to give effect to the Resolutions in question?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware the Resolutions have been passed, and regrets he is not able to give effect to them. The train proposed between Dundalk and Enniskillen is offered by the Company for the purpose of carrying the mails on terms which the Postmaster General is obliged to decline. The Postmaster General is aware that one Company is running third-class passenger carriages and that another has undertaken to do so. He hopes the practice may become general, but he has no power to deal with passenger traffic. I am quite aware of the inconvenience to both mails and passengers of the long delay at Dundalk.

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, has he received a copy of a Resolution unanimously adopted by the Clones Board of Guardians requesting that the terms offered by the Great Northern Railway Company, in regard to the conveyance of mails, be accepted, so that the town of Clones and the district generally from Dundalk to Enniskillen may have the advantage of a connection with the limited mail at Dundalk, and the earlier delivery of mails which would thus be obtained; and will the Postmaster General give effect to the said Resolution?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General does not appear to have received a copy of the Resolution to which the hon. Member refers. The subject of the Resolution, has, however, been fully considered, and the Postmaster General has not felt himself able to accept the terms offered by the Great Northern Railway Company for improving the Day Mail Service to Clones and Enniskillen.

POST OFFICE (FEMALE CLERKS).

MR. R. McKENNA (Monmouth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that in certain post offices female clerks are compelled to be on duty for considerable periods in the year at and before 5 a.m.; and whether it is possible to make such arrangements that female clerks will not be on duty at so early an hour?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware of the circumstance mentioned. It is contrary to the general practice of the Department to bring female clerks on duty at and before 5 a.m., and if the hon. Member will say which are the post offices he has in view inquiry shall be made in the matter.

GRANARD (POLICE ARRANGEMENTS).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction exists in Granard with the police arrangements there, because the district inspector, head constable, and sergeant are Protestants, whilst the great proportion of the men are Roman Catholics; and will he direct a change of officers in this case?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I am not aware that dissatisfaction exists at Granard with the police arrangements there. The allocation of members of the force is made independently of religious considerations, and there is no intention at present to direct a change of officers in this case.

MR. FARRELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman make further inquiry into the matter with the view of making a change?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I see no occasion for making such an inquiry. As I have already said, religious considerations are not taken into account in making these appointments.

RED SEA (LIGHTING).

Sir EDWARD HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has recently been called to the dangers to navigation consequent on the defective lighting of the southern part of the Red Sea; whether any special reason exists for the long neglect of this question; whether there is any prospect of lights being placed on or in the neighbourhood of Abu Ail and Mocha Shoal; and whether Her Majesty's Government will use their best endeavours to hasten the action of the Turkish authorities?

Mr. RITCHIE: In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I can only repeat the answer given to my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Manchester, on 25th March, by my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who said that Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, acting under instructions from Her Majesty's Government, had addressed a circular to the representatives of the Great Powers inviting their co-operation in a joint representation to the Turkish Government for authority to reconstruct a number of fresh lights at the southern end of the Red Sea, including lights at Abu Ail and Mocha Shoal. Her Majesty's Government must await the result of these communications before considering any other possible arrangements.

ARD WEST PIER (CARNA, CONNEMARA).

Mr. W. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the condition of the Ard West Pier, in Carna, Connemara, which was partially destroyed by a storm in 1894, and the remaining portion of which is in such a dangerous condition that the people are afraid to moor their boats alongside it; and whether the Grand Jury, having neglected to authorise the necessary repairs, he will exercise his influence to urge upon the Board of Works the desirability of making those repairs at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Communications have been received as to the state of this pier, and the Board of Works have instructed their engineer to make a report, as soon as possible, in reference to its condition.

POSTAL DELIVERY (CARNA).

Mr. O'MALLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will advise the delivery of letters on Sundays to Carna, Connemara, as at present great inconvenience is caused by the absence of a Sunday post to this populous district?

*Mr. HANBURY: Even the week-day service to Carna is carried on at a loss to the revenue, and, as a Sunday post could not be established without additional expenditure, the Postmaster General is precluded on this ground from complying with the wishes of the hon. Member.

TURCO-GREEK WAR.

General McCALMONT (Antrim, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has noticed a recent report of the bombardment of Santa Quaranta, a defenceless village on the Albanian coast, by Greek men-of-war, and whether he proposes to make any inquiry into the matter?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): Her Majesty's Consul at Corfu reported on the 24th of April that the Greek Squadron had destroyed Santa Quaranta. The matter is a regrettable incident of the war; and I fear that no useful purpose would be served by making inquiry with regard to it.

ARMY REGULATIONS (ST. PATRICK'S DAY).

Mr. J. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that on St. Patrick's Day the sergeants of the 6th Inniskilling Dragoons were forbidden to have their usual dance, and instead of St. Patrick's Day being observed according to the custom in this regiment as a holiday, an extra parade was ordered; also, that a junior officer of this regiment was fined for wearing a piece of shamrock in his cap on St. Patrick's Day, although not on parade; who were the officers responsible for these proceedings; and, whether the Commander-in-Chief has made any investigation into these matters, or expressed to the officer responsible for the order of the regiment his views as to such proceedings?

Mr. BRODRICK: The commanding officer, in his discretion, considered it better that the sergeants should have their dance a few days later. It has not been the custom in the regiment to have a dance on St. Patrick's Day or to keep it as a holiday. No extra parade was ordered, and no officer was fined for wearing shamrock. There was nothing in the proceedings to call for any observations from the Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. MACNEILL: For what reason was the dance postponed?

Mr. BRODRICK: I believe the dance was postponed at the discretion of the commanding officer. I have no idea what was the reason, and I do not intend to ask. [Cheers.]

Mr. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War why, when by letter sent to him to the War Office by the honourable Member for South Donegal, giving what particulars were in his power of the sentence of seven days' imprisonment with hard labour for wearing a shamrock, inflicted on an Irish soldier of the 4th Battalion King's Royal Rifles, who was at that time undergoing that sentence, inquiries were not immediately instituted into the case, which if instituted would have had the effect of stopping the further punishment of the prisoner?

The hon. Member also asked the Under Secretary of State for War whether the authorities have intimated to the commanding officer who sentenced, on the complaint of Sub-Lieutenant Blundell, of the 4th Battalion Royal Rifles, a private named Grindle to seven days' imprisonment with hard labour, for refusing on St. Patrick's Day to take off a shamrock, which Sub-Lieutenant Blundell, in making the order, termed "that dirty bit of greenstuff," any opinion as to the propriety of his conduct in the infliction of a sentence of such severity; whether any explanation has been required from Sub-Lieutenant Blundell of his use of such language, which he has admitted, in reference to the Irish national emblem; and whether the authorities intend, with a view of preventing such occurrences in the future, to express their sense, by reprimand or otherwise, of Sub-Lieutenant Blundell's conduct?

Mr. BRODRICK: In reply to both Questions, I stated to the House fully some weeks ago the facts of this case and the course taken by the general officer commanding at Aldershot, and I have no further statement to make upon it.

Mr. MACNEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that I wrote him a letter and gave him private notice of my intention to put a question with reference to this matter? I gave him the name of the regiment, but could not give him that of the man, and instead of answering, the right hon. Gentleman executed, as a military man, a strategic movement behind the Speaker's chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRODRICK: The hon. Member addressed me an indefinite question by means of a letter as to whether certain events had happened at Aldershot with regard to individuals whose names he did not mention. I told him if he would supply me with the names I would endeavour to get the information.

Mr. MACNEILL asserted that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the second question now addressed to him.

Mr. BRODRICK: I made a full statement with regard to what has occurred, and I am not prepared to make any further statement.

Mr. MACNEILL again rose, when,

*Mr. SPEAKER, interposing, said: The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly within his right in saying that he declines to make any further answer.

Mr. MACNEILL: Very well, I will give him a bad quarter of an hour on the Estimates. [Laughter.]

Captain DONELAN (Cork, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to guard against the repetition of such scandals on future St. Patrick Days?

Mr. BRODRICK: It is impossible for me to give any other answer than I have given. Every man in the Army who desires to wear any emblem which is not part of the authorised and recognised uniform can only do so by the permission of his commanding officer.

Mr. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Northumberland Fusiliers, on the 23rd April, St. George's Day, wore on parade, in accordance with the custom of the regiment on that day, each a red and white rose as a national emblem in his regimentals; and on what principle Irish soldiers in the British Army are punished or insulted for wearing the Irish national emblem on St. Patrick's Day?

MR. BRODRICK: The Secretary of State has no information as to the wearing of roses by the Northumberland Fusiliers on April 23; but as it has been the custom of the regiment for more than 200 years so to distinguish the day under authority from the commanding officer, it is probable they did wear them; individual soldiers in corps in which no such custom exists can only wear emblems if authorised by the commanding officer.

MR. MACNEILL said the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the second part of the Question.

MR. BRODRICK: What the hon. Gentleman, I understand, maintains is that an Irish soldier may wear anything he pleases on a particular day. [Laughter and cries of "No!"] The answer is that, for the wearing of anything beyond the authorised uniform, whatever the emblem may be, authority must be obtained from the officer commanding the regiment. [Cheers.]

CAPTAIN DONELAN asked whether the custom of wearing the shamrock was not even more ancient than that of wearing the rose?

MR. MACNEILL: I would ask whether, as there are 20,000 Irish soldiers—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order! The hon. Member is raising an argument. The Question has been fully answered. Whether he is satisfied with the answer is another matter.

MR. MACNEILL: I am utterly dissatisfied. [Laughter.]

RAIATEA (DISTURBANCES).

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any official report of recent disturbances at Raiatea has reached the Foreign Office; what understanding has prevailed for some years past between the British and French Governments with respect to this island; and whether Raiatea is now practically a French possession?

MR. CURZON: Reports have been received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris and Her Majesty's Consul at Tahiti of measures which have been taken by a French naval force against the natives of Raiatea. The French Government have a protectorate over Raiatea.

ARMY HORSES.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Colony of Victoria has offered to supply a recent requisition for 1,500 horses from his Department; and whether, when his choice is limited to colonial or foreign horses, he will in future give the preference to the former?

MR. BRODRICK: No requisition for 1,500 horses was made, a much smaller quantity being required. The Colony of Victoria offered to land 1,500 horses in South Africa, but at nearly double the price at which suitable horses could be obtained. Preference is always given to home and colonial stock when a suitable supply can be obtained at a reasonable price.

CAPTAIN DONELAN asked whether preference would be given to Irish horses?

MR. BRODRICK said the expense of taking horses from Ireland to South Africa made it prohibitive in this case.

POST OFFICE ANNUITIES.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether complaints have from time to time been made in reference to the scale of Post Office annuities, which requires that a person of 85 years of age should pay as large a sum for an annuity as a person of 80; and whether he will consider the question of so amending the table of annuities as to give to persons over 80 the advantage of a corresponding reduction in the scale of payment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Very few complaints have reached either the Post Office or the National Debt Commissioners with regard to the point to which attention is called in the Question. I will consider the matter, but I cannot undertake to amend the table of annuities in the manner desired. There is a difficulty about securing proof as to the age of very old people, and I am told that the chances of life are not diminished in proportion to the difference between the ages of 80 and 85. I understand that insurance companies find similar precautions necessary to prevent loss on annuities at these great ages.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.

Mr. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether a letter, written on the 1st of this month by the Director of the Science and Art Museum, Dublin, to the President of the Royal Irish Academy, suggesting that six or eight cases containing the best objects in the collection of the Academy, such as the Cross of Cong, etc., should be, during alterations to the room in which the collection of the Royal Irish Academy is now displayed, transported in one of Her Majesty's ships, to be obtained through His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, to Woolwich, and from thence to a good position in the South Kensington Museum, when, after remaining there for four or six weeks, they would be brought again to Dublin with the same precautions as on their outward journey, has had the sanction of the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education; whether the agreement between the Lords of the Committee of Council on Education and the Royal Irish Academy, sealed and signed in November, 1890, whereby it was expressly conditioned and declared that the said Lords of the Committee of Council on Education shall, by acceptance hereof, be bound and obliged to retain the said collection in Ireland, is still binding on both parties; or, if abrogated, for what reasons and from what date; and, if this communication from an official of the Department of Science and Art be unauthorised, will the Department assure the Royal Irish Academy that no further attempts to remove their museum from Dublin will be made?

Sir J. GORST: I understand that the letter in question was a private one. The President of the Royal Irish Academy replied that there were objections to the arrangement suggested, and the matter has dropped.

Mr. MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this private letter emanated from the official office, written on official paper, and signed by this gentleman as director?

Sir J. GORST: Private letters are sometimes written by official persons.

CANALS AND NAVIGABLE RIVERS (IRELAND) BILL.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether representations have been made to him by the Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland to the effect that statutes passed in the reigns of George III. and William IV. would be infringed by the passage of the Canals and Navigable Rivers (Ireland) Bill; and will he lay the correspondence with the railway company upon the Table of the House?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. J. Atkinson, Londonderry, N.): Representations have been made to me by the railway company that, under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, and 58 Geo. III., cap 35, they are bound to do whatever may be required by the Board of Control or Board of Trade to render the canal as little dangerous to the public as is consistent with its use, that they have carried out the directions and requirements of these bodies and are willing to continue to do so, and that the Bill of the hon. Member is entirely unnecessary. It is not intended to lay the correspondence on the Table.

PRISON SYSTEM (SCOTLAND).

Mr. T. C. H. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, under the present Scots prison system, prisoners on the sick list are dependent for nursing solely upon the offices of any two fellow criminals (without test of knowledge or capacity) who may happen to be placed in the same cell; and, if so, whether, having regard to the fact that this system has been condemned and abolished both in England and Ireland, he will take steps to secure its abolition in Scotland also, and the substitution in lieu thereof of adequate provision for the proper nursing of sick prisoners by trained infirmary warders or otherwise?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: The hon. Member has been misinformed. Special "Nurse" warders are appointed where necessary. In other cases nursing duties are performed either by the ordinary warder staff or by specially selected prisoners. When prisoners are very ill there is power to send them to a hospital, with the assent of the sheriff. The existing system works satisfactorily, and I see no reason for altering it.

WORKMEN (COMPENSATION FOR ACCIDENTS) BILL.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when it is intended to take any Committee stage which may be necessary on the expenses involved by the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill, on which the question of costs may be raised?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have consulted the officers of the House, and learn that it would not be usual to take any Committee stage that may be necessary in regard to the expenses of arbitrators or compensation to Crown workmen until the Bill has been read a Second time.

TELEGRAPH OFFICES (PUBLIC GUARANTEE).

MR. W. T. HOWELL (Denbigh Boroughs): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the contemplated reduction in the amount of guarantee required for small telegraph offices is to apply to existing guarantees or only to future guarantees?

MR. HANBURY: The concession recently announced with regard to guarantees for small telegraph offices will apply to existing as well as future guarantees. But the concession is not rightly described as a reduction in the amount of guarantee required. It is an undertaking by the Exchequer to share equally with the guarantor any loss which may arise upon the guaranteed office.

LOAN FUND SOCIETIES (IRELAND).

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the new rules suggested by the recent Commission of Inquiry into the working of the Irish Loan Fund Board system will come into operation; what steps, if any, have been taken to carry out the recommendations of the Commission; and whether the Government intend, by legislation or otherwise, to remedy the abuses of the Irish Loan Fund system disclosed by the Report of the Commission?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The new rules approved by the Loan Fund Board have been issued to Loan Fund societies for adoption within 28 days. These rules substantially embody most of the recommendations of the Committee of Inquiry. The Government are considering the question of the necessity of further legislation with a view to strengthen the administration and supervision of the Central Board.

MR. MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why the Irish Loan Fund Board, which is obliged, under provisions of the 6 and 7 Vic. c. 91, s. 7, to furnish an annual Report to Parliament on or before the 31st March in each year, has failed in this duty; when will this Report be presented; and whether, having regard to the numerous instances of abuse disclosed in the working of the Irish Loan Fund system, and admitted by the right hon. Gentleman, the Government will take immediate steps in the interests of the public for the reform of this system?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The delay in furnishing the annual Report at the usual time has been caused by the additional labour falling upon the Loan Fund Board in connection with the late Committee of Inquiry. The Report, I am informed, will not be ready for presentation for some weeks to come. It will include statements concerning the new Rules, and steps taken, or decided upon, by the Board for the improved management of Loan Fund Societies.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: Is it proposed to publish the evidence taken at the Inquiry?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No; I do not think it will be necessary, in view of the fact that the Report is a very full Report.

MR. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) if he can now state what steps the Irish Government propose taking in respect of the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the administration of the Irish Loan Funds; and (2) what means will be adopted to protect the debenture holders in the Loan Fund Societies from the serious threatened losses by reason of this maladministration?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The first paragraph has already been answered by me in replying to the Questions of the hon. Member for South Donegal. With regard to the second paragraph, I am informed that a case raising the liability of borrowers of Loan Fund Societies, which affects, of course, the security of debenture holders, has recently been argued in the Queen's Bench Division and now awaits the decision of that Court.

MARYBOROUGH PRISON (IRELAND).

MR. M. J. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a statement of evidence and also a petition praying for the release of Thomas Collins, at present confined in the invalid prison of Maryborough; whether inquiries have been made in reference thereto; and whether the prisoner's release will be granted?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The statement of evidence and the petition referred to praying for the release of Convict Thomas Collins were duly received and acknowledged. After full consideration of all the circumstances of the case, the Lords Justices decided, on Friday last, that there was no ground to interfere with the sentence.

BROOKEBOROUGH PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to a case heard at the last petty sessions at Brookeborough before Mr. Jones, R.M., Sir Victor Brooke and Mr. James Beatty, in which a man named Kirkpatrick was prosecuted by the first cousin of Mr. James Beatty, J.P., for trespass in pursuit of game and was fined £3; if he is aware that Sir Victor Brooke and Mr. Jones, R.M., declined to adjudicate in the case, on the ground that it would be unseemly or illegal in them to take part in the hearing as they were members of the Hunt Club, thus leaving Mr. James Beatty to decide the case in favour of his own near relative, and to inflict the pecuniary penalty of £3; and what action will the Lord Chancellor take in the case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: I have obtained further reports in reference to this case, from which it would appear that the trespass for which a fine of £3 was inflicted on Kirkpatrick was committed on the lands of the Rev. Mr. Clinton and prosecuted by him, and that no fine was inflicted on Kirkpatrick in respect of the trespass alleged to have been committed on the lands of Mr. Beatty, the cousin of one of the presiding Magistrates. Mr. Jones, R.M., adjudicated in the first case, and I believe Sir V. Brooke retired for the reasons stated. If Kirkpatrick is in a position to show that Mr. Beatty had such an interest in the matter as in law disqualifies a Magistrate from acting judicially, he can take proceedings to have the conviction quashed. It does not seem to be a case calling for action by the Lord Chancellor.

ARTILLERY PRACTICE (SOLENT).

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the near approach of the season when the waters around the Isle of Wight are much frequented by yachts and passenger vessels, he can now state whether any decision has been come to in reference to the proposed bye-laws for Artillery practice over the waters of Spithead and the Solent?

MR. BRODRICK: I fear that these bye-laws will not be issued for some little time, possibly not till after the present summer. There are difficulties in the interpretation of the Acts governing ranges, and legislation may be necessary.

RADHANPUR (STATE PROPERTY).

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the indignities alleged to have been inflicted on the widow of the Nawab of Radhanpur through the Political Agent, Major Lyde, under whose orders the guards were removed from the zenana, the Begum's allowances stopped, her jewels and wardrobe seized, and property assigned to her by the will of the Nawab taken away; whether he is aware that, under the pretext of securing hidden treasures, the palace had been rudely rifled two or three times, the last occasion being so recently as the 15th April; if treasure has been found at the palace, is he satisfied that it belongs to the State, and not to the estate of the late Nawab, to be applied for purposes designated in his will; and can copies of the reports of the Political Agent, and of the memorial presented by the Begum to the Bombay Government, be laid upon the Table, together with such replies as Lord Sandhurst's Government may have recorded in reference to these transactions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I am aware of the circumstances to which the hon. Member's Question relates. The object of the measures which have been taken was to prevent the misappropriation of property which belonged to the State of Radhanpur, and I am advised that the Government of Bombay is satisfied that the property thus recovered is State property, with the exception of certain articles which, as soon as they were proved to belong to the Hindu widow of the late Nawab, were at once restored to her. I have no reason to believe that any harsh or offensive measures were employed. When the corespondence relating to this matter is complete I will consider whether it can be laid on the Table of the House.

EXCISE PROSECUTION (MARYLEBONE).

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to a Revenue prosecution for exercising the business of a compounder of cordials without a licence, heard at the Marylebone Police Court on Thursday last, when it was proved that the cordials had been manufactured for years with the knowledge of the Revenue officers, and the magistrate, in dismissing the summons with costs, observed that in the circumstances the defendant should have been warned before proceedings were taken; whether he is aware that, in many other instances, the Revenue authorities have acted in the same way in instituting prosecutions; and whether he will direct them to exercise a little more care and consideration for the future?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: My attention has been called to the case mentioned by the hon Member. I understand that the facts reported to the Board of Inland Revenue as to the operations carried on by the defendant were such as to convince them that it was a proper case for a prosecution. Had they been aware that the defendant had been carrying on the same business for some years with the knowledge of any of their officers, they would certainly have dealt with the case in a different way. But, until evidence to that effect was given in Court by one of their officers, they had no ground for thinking that this was so, and an inquiry is now being made into the matter. I am not aware of any other cases in which this has occurred, and I quite agree with the hon. Member that care should be taken to prevent its recurrence.

QUEENSLAND.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there is on record at the Colonial Office a Dispatch from one of his predecessors, the Duke of Newcastle, dated 14th December 1861, asserting, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, the right to deal with the then unsettled Central and Northern Districts of Queensland as the wishes and convenience of future settlers might require, and to erect those districts into distinct colonies when found to be sufficiently advanced and populous to justify such a concession; and whether he is aware that there is a general consensus of local opinion that the time has now arrived when the conditions of progress and settlement, foreshadowed by the Duke of Newcastle at the creation of the present colony of Queensland, have been fully accomplished, and that the promise made by him on behalf of Her Majesty's Government ought to be promptly redeemed?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The Dispatch referred to by the hon. Member had reference only to the area to the north of the 26th parallel of latitude and between the 141st and 138th meridians of east longitude which Queensland then wished to take over, and which was, by the Letters Patent of 13th March 1862, annexed to Queensland. The Dispatch had no reference to any question of sub-dividing Queensland, as defined by the Letters Patent of 1859.

ROMFORD RAILWAY STATION (FATAL ACCIDENT).

MR. LOUIS SINCLAIR (Essex, Romford): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) whether the Inquiry, as promised, has been held relating to the accident at Romford railway station on 31st March, at which a man met his death; and, if so, with what result; (2) whether the Board of Trade have decided to recommend that in all cases where shunting operations are carried on by horses on any main line there should be two men with each pair of horses, whereas in this case there was only one; and (3) whether, seeing that the man after meeting with such a serious accident, had to be carried away on an ordinary wooden hurdle, he will endeavour to press upon the railway companies the necessity of providing a proper ambulance at all shunting stations on main lines, so that in case of accident the sufferer may be carried away without aggravated suffering?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; the Board of Trade have just received the report. It recommends that consideration should be given to the necessity for providing a second man in such cases, and the recommendation will be communicated to the company. I will direct the attention of the Railway Association to the third paragraph of the hon. Member's Question.

COLLECTION OF RATES (DUBLIN).

MR. CAREW: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been drawn to the resolutions adopted by the North Dublin and South Dublin Board of Guardians, asking that Measures should be passed to enable those bodies to provide for the collection of their own rates; and (2) whether, if the Government will not itself introduce such a Measure, it will support it if introduced by a private Member?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Resolutions to the effect stated have been adopted by the local bodies referred to in the first paragraph. I have already explained that the matter is not one with which the Government can undertake to deal, and I cannot give any pledge that the Government would support such a Measure if introduced by a private Member.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES (CO. MEATH).

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, what progress has been made towards carrying out the scheme for the erection of labourers' cottages in Kells, County of Meath?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Loans for the erection of 75 cottages in this Union were sanctioned by the Local Government Board in July 1896, and there are already built in the Union, under previous schemes, 231 cottages. The Board are informed by the Clerk of the Union that possession has been obtained of 41 out of the 75 sites included in the last scheme, and that contracts have been entered into by the Guardians for the erection of 20 of the cottages. Steps are also being taken by them to obtain possession of the remaining sites to enable the erection of the cottages to be proceeded with.

BLACKROCK TOWNSHIP COMMISSIONERS.

*MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury (1) if it has come to his knowledge that the Blackrock Township Commissioners are engaged in consolidating their township loans by the issue of debenture stock for the purpose of paying off £12,084 due to the Board of Works; that the Board of Works refuse to accept repayment unless on condition that for every £100 due the Blackrock Commissioners shall pay £114 10s.; (2) whether he is aware that when the loans were obtained no intimation was given that such a condition would be imposed, and that no such condition was inserted in the mortgages to the Board of Works; and (3) whether this is a legal demand by the Board of Works upon the ratepayers of Blackrock in view of the conditions of the mortgages agreed to by the Board of Works when the loans were granted?

*Mr. HANBURY: I am aware of the facts mentioned in the first paragraph, though they are stated in a somewhat misleading form, and the amount outstanding is £11,598, and not as stated in the Question. This sum represents the outstanding balances of 19 recent loans advanced by the Board of Works at different dates between 1888 and 1896, for specified periods varying from 15 to 50 years. The mortgages distinctly state that the repayments are to be spread over these periods, and there is no condition enabling the borrowers to pay them off earlier to suit their own convenience, and at the loss of nearly 15 per cent. of capital to the lenders, the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. The rule is the same for all loans, whether in England, Scotland or Ireland. So long as the market price of local loans stock is considerably above par, as at present, the solvency of the Local Loans Fund might be seriously affected by premature repayments of the loans at par only, and it is therefore the practice of the Treasury to safeguard the taxpayer by refusing to allow premature repayment at a price far below the current market price of the stock. The demand is, of course, perfectly legal.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.), who congratulated the First Lord of the Treasury on his recovery from indisposition—[cheers]—asked whether, considering the number of times the House has recently been counted out, and the difficulty of finding work for it, he will consider the propriety of arranging business so that Parliament may be prorogued on Jubileee Day, the 22nd June?

Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that supporters of the Government have brought in several Bills of an uncontentious character, and that last week the House was counted out twice on Government nights, there not being sufficient Government business to occupy the time, the Government will take into consideration the propriety of giving up part of their time to private Members, or at least arrange to keep a House when Bills or resolutions introduced by their supporters are under discussion?

Mr. B. L. COHEN (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the fact that under the Resolution of 29th January, Fridays are allotted to the Business of Supply, whether the Government will for the future move the Adjournment of the House so soon as the business of Supply is disposed of?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Mr. A. J. Balfour, Manchester, E.): I am afraid that my hon. Friend the Member for South Belfast and other hon. Members also take a much too sanguine view with regard to the business we have still to get through before the end of the Session. The House knows, roughly speaking, what that business is, and if hon. Members will take the trouble to forecast the amount of time which may be occupied over it, they will see that to prophesy the termination of the Session on June 22, or possibly even on July 22, would be to take too sanguine a view of the circumstances. My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall asks whether the Government will give up some of their time, having—not as they think—so much of it to spare, for the purpose of allowing more progress to be made with private Members' Bills. I gather that he and the hon. Member for East Islington are of opinion that on Friday nights the time not taken up by Supply might be appropriately filled up for this particular purpose. But I may remind the House that Friday night has never been given up to private Members' legislation. It has always been a Government night, subject, of course, to the claims of private Members to move resolutions on the Motion for getting the Speaker out of the Chair in order to go into Committee. When the new Friday rule was passed, the night remained a Government night, on which, after Supply was finished, Government business had precedence. An appeal was made to the Government that, in consideration of the fact that the first claim on the evening had been given to them for Supply, they would not use any portion of the night, after the disposal of Supply, for the purpose of passing their own legislation. That appeal was acceded to by the Government, and the result is that private Members have tried to fill up the vacuum after Supply has been finished, and have asked the House to consider their Bills. Now I am not sure that that is a convenient plan. ["Hear, hear!"] It forces private Members to watch for legislation on Friday, and to come down to the House in case any private Members' Bills should be reached. I think we should carry out the spirit of the sessional order much better by keeping Friday night for Supply only. ["Hear, hear!"] Then the question may be asked, why the Government do not put down enough Supply on Friday so as to prevent the possibility of a count-out; and of course they could, if they liked, put down as effective Supply all the Supply still left for consideration. I have deliberately abstained from that course for this reason: I feel that if we were to put down too much Supply, we should probably get not more, but fewer Votes, for Members would probably be under the impression that the Government intended to take advantage of them, and Members interested in remote Votes would feel bound to come to the House on the chance that those Votes might be reached. Therefore, I have aimed at putting down only a reasonable amount of Supply on Fridays, and I still think that that is the more convenient course. ["Hear, hear!"] Although it may, perhaps, seem to the public outside that a count on Friday night at 10 or 11 o'clock is a waste of public time, I think it really is not so, and that we get through the business more quickly by the arrangement which I have endeavoured to carry out than we should by any other. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore, I shall continue, subject to what I may hear, with the plan I have adopted with regard to the amount of Supply to be put down on Fridays. But I think it would be an improvement if, henceforth, when the Votes have been disposed of, we were to move the adjournment of the House. [Cheers.]

SIR BARRINGTON SIMEON (Southampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether an opportunity of concluding the Debate on Vote 10, Class I., Civil Service Estimates (Ordnance Survey), which Debate was not concluded when the House rose on the morning of Saturday 10th April, will be given; and, if so, whether he can say when that date will be?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I cannot promise my hon. Friend that any further opportunity will be given for the discussion of this Vote. A certain amount of discussion upon it has already been taken, and until I can better foresee the course of business I cannot give any undertaking on the subject.

WAR RISKS (NATIONAL INSURANCE).

MR. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Defence Committee has yet framed any scheme for the national insurance of British ships and cargoes against war risks in time of war; and, if so, whether the arrangements made will be communicated to the public, so as to avoid panic and maintain confidence in the event of an outbreak of war?

SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Defence Committee has power to enact any such scheme, and whether it is not necessary to obtain Parliamentary sanction for a financial scheme of such importance?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The Defence Committee have no legislative powers, of course, and I imagine that all they could do if public funds were required for any purpose such as that suggested by my hon. Friend would be to come to Parliament for the necessary powers. We have prepared no plan for the purpose referred to in the Question on the Paper, but I think the matter is one of great interest, and does deserve the attention of the Defence Committee. ["Hear, hear!"]

ELEMENTARY TEACHERS (PENSIONS FUND).

MR. D. H. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the advanced state of the Government business, he will be able, this Session, to bring in a Bill to provide a pension fund for teachers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: In view of the large amount of time which has already been occupied during the present Session by subjects connected with elementary education, I cannot hold out any very sanguine hope to my hon. Friend that this question, the great importance of which the Government fully recognise, can be adequately dealt with this year.

TURCO-GREEK WAR.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I should like to be allowed to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to make any statement to the House as to any communications that may have passed between the Greek Government and the Powers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, Sir. As, I think, the right hon. Gentleman will readily be in a position to conjecture, it would not be expedient while negotiations are pending to make any statement.

MR. MORLEY: May we suppose from that that negotiations are pending?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes, Sir that is so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY asked what business it was proposed to take on Thursday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I cannot really say what business will be taken on Thursday until I know what progress we shall make tonight. I should hope that we shall finish the Budget Resolutions to-night, and in that case the morning sitting tomorrow will be devoted to the next stage of the Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill, with the Metropolitan Police-courts Bill as second Order, and the Post Office Consolidation Bill third. If we do not succeed in passing the Budget Resolutions to-night, some of that business will have to be postponed till Thursday.

MR. J. P. FARRELL asked whether it was intended to proceed that night with the fourth Order of the Day, the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill?

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked whether, in view of the action of the Government with regard to the money allocated to Ireland in 1896, the right hon. Gentleman would state what were the intentions of the Government as to proceeding with the Bill just mentioned and the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: If both hon. Members will be kind enough to defer their Questions till Thursday I will then try to answer them.

MR. LOUGH: I understand that no progress will be attempted to be made with the Bills until the Government have made up their minds on the financial question?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, Sir.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE. (MORNING SITTINGS ON TUESDAY).

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY moved: "That, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet on Tuesdays at two of the clock." He said: I think on all sides of the House it will be felt that Tuesdays ought to be more utilised than they are at present for getting through the necessary business of the Session. Some of my critics might say that I ought to take the whole of Tuesdays, and it is not impossible that at a later date I may have to come to this House and ask for such facilities; but I am reluctant to do so. I therefore content myself now with proposing this Resolution, which is moved this year at a later period than in the previous Session. There have been several Tuesdays of late during the earlier part of which we have had some interesting discussions, and during the remainder of which the House enjoyed a greater amount of leisure than usual. I hope the House will feel that we are making no undue call on the time of private Members when we come on May 12 to ask them to give up some part of their privileges.

MR. SYDNEY GEDGE (Walsall) said he would much rather that the Government should ask the House to give up the whole of Tuesday than that they should inflict upon hon. Members the burden of morning sittings. These morning sittings were all very well for Members from Ireland who came over here and left their businesses behind them, and also for Members from Scotland; but for commercial and professional men in London they were very objectionable. They found it almost impossible to attend them, and he was afraid his right hon. Friend must make up his mind to see the Government majority somewhat reduced on these occasions. He would far rather see private Members killed than compelled to commit suicide. What hon. Members having been in the House from two o'clock to seven would take the trouble to come down again at nine o'clock for private Members' business? He thought private Members might have a little more consideration shown to them in those matters. What the constituencies really wanted was the Bills introduced by private Members, and yet the Bill promoted by his hon. Friend the Member for East Somerset was counted out the other night when there were enough Members of the Government behind the Speaker's chair to make a House. ["Hear, hear!"] For these reasons he certainly hoped the Government would very soon take the whole of Tuesdays.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (1870) AMENDMENT BILL.

The following notices stood upon the Paper:—

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester): On Order for Committee on Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill being read, to move:—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert provisions enabling the Education Department to check, if they think fit, the increase of the sum expended per scholar for maintenance under any School Board receiving a contribution under this Bill."

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): On Order for Committee on Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill being read, to move:—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert clauses in the Bill with a view to provide that payment may be made to School Boards of all arrears which may remain unpaid of the sums to which such School Boards would have been entitled to receive under Section 97 of the Elementary Education Act 1870, if the said Boards had made application therefor to the Education Department from year to year as such sums became due and payable."

*MR. SPEAKER said that the Instruction to the Committee which the noble Lord the Member for Rochester had given notice to enable the Education Department to check the increase of the sum expended per scholar for maintenance under any School Board receiving a contribution under the Bill was out of order, because its object might be obtained by an Amendment. The other Instruction standing on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire, providing for the payment of arrears under Section 97 of the Act of 1870, was also out of order, because its object was to increase the grant which was voted in Committee, and it would be quite out of order as an Instruction.

[While Mr. Speaker was delivering the above ruling, several Members passed down the floor of the House amid cries of "Order!"]

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is not one of the Standing Orders of the House that when you rise in the Chair every Member should remain seated? ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: That is the Rule, and it is important in the interests of the order and decency of the proceedings of the House that it should be observed.

Bill considered in Committee.

POWER TO INCREASE GRANT UNDER 33 & 34 VICT. C. 75. S. 97.

(1.) Section ninety-seven of the Elementary Education Act 1870, shall have effect as if the sum of seven shillings and sixpence therein mentioned were increased by the sum of fourpence for every complete penny by which the School Board rate for the year therein mentioned exceeded threepence. Provided that the said sum of seven shillings and sixpence shall not be thereby increased beyond a maximum of sixteen shillings and sixpence.

(2.) "School Board rate" means the rate in the pound on the rateable value of the district which would have produced the sum required in the said year for the purpose of the annual expenses of the Board, and actually paid in that year to the treasurer by the rating authority.

MR. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.) moved in Sub-section (2), after the word "required," to insert the words, "and actually paid to the Treasurer." He said he desired by the Amendment to make the meaning of the clause quite clear. Sub-section (2) stated that the School Board rate meant the rate which would have produced the sum required in the said year; but, as a rule, the rate was 1-12th more than was actually paid to the Treasurer. Therefore he wished to transpose the words, "and actually paid to the Treasurer." He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would recognise that this Amendment was necessary.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University) said he was informed by his professional adviser that the form in which the Clause was drawn was now clear.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR J. GORST said the Government proposed the following Amendment to meet the question of balance:—

"In calculating for the purpose of Section 97 of the Act the annual expenses of the School Board, the Education Act shall include such sum as is necessary for maintaining such working balance as the Education Department determine to be necessary."

The effect of the Amendment would be that a Board would be able to carry a reasonable balance over to the next year as part of its necessary expenses. He suggested that the Amendment should be discussed on Report.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) said that this showed that the Amendment of his hon. Friend (Mr. Channing) was a genuine one. He had no doubt that the words of the Government Amendment, when they came to be read, would prove satisfactory to the School Boards throughout the country.

MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said he was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the spirit in which he had dealt with this matter.

*MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.) expressed the hope that before the Report stage the Vice President would reconsider the terms of his Amendment so that the amount by which any balance in the hands of a School Board at the beginning of a year exceeded the amount of the balance at the close of the year might be regarded as equivalent to an amount contributed out of the rates during the year, and to that extent influence the grant under the Bill.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) thought the Vice President of the Council had met the case very fairly, but that at the same time he might have converted the first "may" into "shall."

SIR J. GORST took it that this was one of the cases in which "may" should mean "shall," but in order to put all doubt at an end he would move the Amendment in the suggested amended form. ["Hear, hear!"] He was afraid the present Amendment would not meet such a case as that the hon. Member for West Ham had put.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said that, personally, he should have been content if the right hon. Gentleman had, without putting an Amendment in the Bill, given them a promise as regarded the practice of the Department, because he could not but think that the practice of the Department in the particular case which had been brought to the knowledge of hon. Members by means of a circular was wrong and illegal. He thought it would have satisfied the authorities concerned if the Vice President had told the Committee that the practice in this matter would be made straight. He did not think the practice had been uniformly wrong; indeed, his impression was that in other cases the matter had been fairly dealt with.

*MR. GRAY said that he must press his right hon. Friend. In many districts the matter he had drawn attention to had given much trouble. The School Board year closed on September 29th, and very probably on the 30th the School Board had to meet very large claims. If the rating authority could not pay the School Board on the morning of the 30th sums sufficient to meet those claims, the School Board must carry over from the 29th a sufficient sum to meet the claims, hence the necessity for an actual working balance. He feared that in many places the School Boards might be put on the 30th of September in the position of defaulters unless they kept fairly large balances.

Mr. CHANNING said the junior Member for Halifax had handed him a statement respecting the Halifax School Board which raised the question of the interpretation the Education Department would put upon the words "reasonable balance." The clerk to the Board wrote:—

> "Taking, for instance, the case of our own Board (our financial year ends March 25), on September 29, 1896, the balance in hand happened to be £2,663, the amount of rate levied £20,975; but, according to the proposal of the Government, as our Board understands it, the amount of aid under the new Bill would be calculated only upon £18,312. In the previous year, at the same date, it happened that the Board had at its bankers the very large balance of £11,630, and if the aid to be given had been calculated upon the difference between the rate levied and this chance balance no grant at all would have been due under the provisions of this Bill."

It was quite evident they required a litle more enlightenment as to what would be the standard or the principle upon which the Education Department would attempt to determine this very difficult question.

Sir J. GORST could not help thinking that with a little more care the balances might be made rather more uniform than the hon. Member had shown those at Halifax to have been. What the Department would do would be to seek to prevent a School Board from keeping such a balance as would really defeat the intention of the Act. There would be no desire to restrain the necessary variations in the amounts, or, in other words, to interfere with local finance; but the Department would, of course, enable a School Board to keep such balances as were necessary.

*Sir JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) said it would, perhaps, be better to defer the discussion of the Amendment until they had seen the actual words; but he would ask the Vice President to consider the point raised by the hon. Member for West Ham. He did not quite gather the reason which induced the right hon. Gentleman to prefer his own Amendment to that proposed by the hon. Member for Northamptonshire. Personally, he should have thought it would have been more convenient to leave out both balances and deal with the actual expenditure. It stood to reason that there might be cases connected with the erection of new schools and other matters which might make a balance reasonable one year, while it would be unreasonable another year. This and other points deserved careful consideration, but, at the same time, they could not discuss them with advantage without having seen the actual words of the Amendment proposed by his right hon. Friend.

Amendment, as amended, put and agreed to.

On the Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill,"

Mr. ACLAND said it did not follow that if he and others had not put down Amendments, they were in any sense satisfied with the clause as one calculated to assist School Boards. In a money Bill of this sort, the House of Commons was not able to settle the amount of money which it thought fit should be granted to the ratepayers for their schools. They had to accept from the Chancellor of the Exchequer the sum he thought fit to name, and they must take it or leave it, although they might disapprove of the general relief which it gave. Therefore, as it was perfectly obvious that £110,000 was better than nothing, they must not vote against the clause—[ironical Ministerial cheers]—but it was only from that point of view that the clause could be accepted by many of those who were interested in School Boards. Speaking broadly, he should say that nobody supposed that the School Boards themselves were satisfied with the amount which was supposed to relieve their necessities, and which only gave them 1s. per child as compared with the 5s. per child which the House had already granted to the Voluntary or non-Board Schools. If they took the School Boards numerically, they saw how very few of them, though bearing a large burden of rates, got any advantage whatever under this clause. There were 2,500 Boards in the country, and it was said that nearly 800 Boards got relief under the clause. That was true in a nominal sense, but 25 per cent. of them got less than £10, so that they might be eliminated as getting practically no relief. Then another 25 per cent. got more than £10, but less than £50, and, except in the case of a few country parishes, a sum of less than £50 was practically no relief at all. So that half of them got practically what was no relief at all, and out of the 2,500 only 300 or 400 got any effective relief, and in the large districts, whether they got sums of £50 or £200, the amount of relief was entirely inadequate. They had heard again and again that this was a Bill to relieve the necessities of poor School Boards. Did it do that from the point of view of those who bore the burden of the rates? He thought everybody who watched the working of Section 97 must come to the conclusion that that Section was a very inadequate machine for the purpose of meeting necessities, and unfortunately it had been taken as the basis for further relief rather than that the subject should have been grappled in some new form, and by a completely new Act of Parliament. This left an enormous number of inequalities, which would be seen more and more as years went on, and which must arise from this clause when it became part of an Act of Parliament. They knew from the Return the Vice President had given that, while there were schools with only a 4d., 5d., or 6d. rate which would get grants, schools paying a 10d., 11d., and 1s. rate would get nothing whatever. No explanation based on the difference of rateable value, or the difference between what was called a rich town and a poor town, could possibly adequately get rid of the extreme inequalities which arose under the clause. He did not think anybody could be surprised that even large towns which were deeply attached to the present Government through their representatives in that House were extremely dissatisfied with the clause as it stood. The Birmingham School Board had, with only one dissentient, resolved that the clause was thoroughly unsatisfactory to them. Nobody could be surprised at this when a place had devoted itself to education as Birmingham had, and when, though it was paying a 1s. rate, it got nothing whatever, whereas, if it had been paid 5s. per head as well as the Voluntary Schools, it would have received no less than £12,000 a year. That was a very heavy penalty to place on Birmingham, which had stood in the van in many respects among English towns. Bradford, too, was in very much the same position. It simply remained for them to say that the provision now made was full of inequalities from the point of view of relieving the necessities of ratepayers and, on its own principle, that there was no kind of permanence in it.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS said that he entirely agreed with his right hon. Friend, that the relief afforded by this Bill was absolutely inadequate and almost insulting to the School Boards of the country. But he wanted to ask the Government whether they could not go a step further and bring in an Amendment to the clause on the Report stage which would enable the Education Department to give to School Boards the arrears that were already due to them under Section 97, but which they neglected to apply for when the money was due to them? The amount of unclaimed grants due to these small and poorer School Boards was something like £14,000, of which £4,000 were due to the poorest School Boards in Wales. The Vice President stated in the House a few weeks ago that he was advised by the Law Officers that he could not give more than one year's arrears, but a very simple addition to this clause would enable the Government to take to themselves power to give the whole of the arrears to those School Boards to which they were due. He would ask the Vice President whether the Government would take that most reasonable course?

*MR. ERNEST GRAY said that there was one point he would like to raise, though the Vice President might think he was unduly anxious. He would remind his right hon. Friend and the Committee that there would be no payments made under this Act until October next, and if they could, by a word or two from the Vice President, clear away the anxiety which would exist between now and then, perhaps the Committee would not think the few moments wasted. He referred to this question of the rate in the pound and the rateable value. He would admit that his own anxiety had been removed by the answers the Vice President had given him on various occasions, but the words of the Bill were not clear. The words "rateable value" were used outside by rating authorities and by School Boards in some four or five different senses, and considerable anxiety had been experienced as to what the Department understood the term rateable value to mean. If the grants under the Act were to be paid in accordance with the rate in the pound on the gross rateable value of the district, then there would be a very material difference between the sums so paid, and the amounts which would be paid if the net rateable value of the district were meant. ["Hear, hear!"] He understood the operation under the Act would be this, that after a closed rate was formed, the rating authority would know exactly what one penny in the pound would produce. That was excluding from the gross rateable value the cost of collecting, loss by compounding, empties, and various other items of that nature. In the poorer districts, this meant a very material difference indeed. In West Ham it meant a difference of nearly 1s. per child between the rate on the net rateable value and the rate on the gross rateable value. He understood the Vice President to say that it was the intention of the Department that it should be the net rateable value, and if he would state that in his place it would remove a very large amount of uneasiness which otherwise would undoubtedly prevail between the passing of the Act and its first application in October next. He was not alone amongst those who desired to have a clear, definite and explicit interpretation given to the words of a very abstruse clause. This difficulty did exist outside, and he hoped the Vice President would by a word or two clear that misapprehension away and relieve the anxiety of those who were looking forward with some pleasure to the operation of this Act.

*Sir C. DILKE said his final grumble at this clause concerned the maximum which had been placed in the Bill. He had been unable to understand why that maximum had been placed in the Bill. A sliding scale which became a more operative scale as poverty increased, ought logically, and in the nature of things, to have no maximum. The case of the Government for the maximum in this clause was that the particular point fixed was not likely to be reached. He was not so sure of that. There was a particular parish which he had in his view, in which the fall of the rateable value had been very rapid, and the rates had increased in three successive half years—7s., 8s., and from 8s. to 9s. That was entirely caused by the fall in the rateable value, and therefore he was bound to say that the maximum which the Government, though they had put it in the Bill, believed would never be reached, would really be reached in some cases.

Mr. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said he agreed with the hon. Member for West Ham as to the extreme necessity for making it clear whether the calculation as to the threepenny rate was on the gross rateable value or on the nett rateable value. In almost all public offices the calculation as to what a threepenny rate would produce was based on the nett rateable value, and that, of course, was a different thing from what a threepenny rate would produce in collection, especially in the poorer districts, where it varied from time to time. Therefore when they spoke of a threepenny rate it should be made clear whether it meant a rate calculated by the method adopted by the Local Government Board and other public offices, or meant the actual produce of a threepenny rate.

*Sir W. HART DYKE (Kent, Dartford) said he rose to challenge the statement made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham in regard to the educational position that had brought about the introduction of the Bill. His right hon. Friend seemed to have forgotten what the position of affairs was at the last general election in regard to the Voluntary Schools and the Board Schools of the country. At that election it was pointed out by Unionist candidates in all constituencies, town and country, that there was such a difference between the monetary aid given by the rates to the Board Schools and to the Voluntary Schools that unless something was done to reduce the inequality by means of a Government grant, the almost immediate extinction of the voluntary system would result, and it was in pursuance of the pledges then given that the Voluntary Schools Act had been passed and that this Bill was also introduced. The constituencies were appealed to on behalf of the Voluntary Schools, and they replied that something should be done for those schools. Therefore it was not fair for hon. Members opposite to try to establish a grievance because of the difference between the sum given to the Voluntary Schools and the sum given to the Board Schools, as no question had been presented to the constituencies in regard to the Board Schools at the general election. But he thought that hon. Members opposite had a right to demand that where a district was so poor that a good Board School could not be maintained, that a sufficient sum should be found by the State to secure adequate education for the children of that district, and if the Bill did not bring about that object, the Government would be wise even at that stage to listen to an Amendment moved in that direction. But the Bill was never intended to be a ratepayers' relief Bill. If the School Board rate was oppressive, the ratepayers had the relief in their own hands. So long as they returned to the School Board educational enthusiasts who spent the rates lavishly, they had no ground to come to Parliament and ask for relief.

Sir HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.) said he desired to enter a mild protest against the historic account given by his right hon. Friend both as to the general election and the intentions of this Bill. He had read many articles and speeches dealing with the reasons which had given the other side their majority at the last general election. He had always supposed that it was high Imperial considerations that had placed the Government in power—such as the profound dissatisfaction with the administrative and the legislative programmes of the late Liberal Government; the determination to uphold the integrity of the Empire, and to protect certain interests—some secular and some spiritual—which were supposed to be gravely menaced. But he had never before heard the victory of the Government attributed to an invincible desire on the part of the constituencies of the country to remedy the grievances—the undoubted grievances, he admitted—of the Voluntary Schools. His right hon. Friend had also said the Bill was never intended to be a ratepayers' relief Bill. If a true biography of the Bill could be written, or if some future correspondence disclosed its genesis, its production, modification and final settlement, they should have an extraordinary history indeed. He believed the taxpayers of the country were quite as much alive to the relief of the ratepayers as to the relief of the subscribers to Voluntary Schools; that they would regard a Bill as unjust, and he believed they would take an early opportunity of rectifying the mistake of the Government in treating the Voluntary Schools and the Board Schools differently—not to the disadvantage of the Voluntary Schools, but in order to do justice to the ratepayers. He should not have revived those controversies if his right hon. Friend had not entered a protest against the statements on that side of the House in reference to the injustice of the Bill, for if they were to remain silent it might be assumed that they accepted the protest of his right hon. Friend. When the time came—it would not be in the House—he would be prepared to justify up to the hilt all that had been said, not only against the injustice, but against the impolicy of this Bill. Coming to details, he thought it was right that they should have some definition as to what the Government meant in reference to the vexed question of rateable value. He would point out to his hon. Friend the Member for Shoreditch that there was no such thing as gross rateable value and nett rateable value; but there was gross rental and nett rateable value. Take a rateable value of £240,000 a year. A rate of 3d. in the pound would not produce in that case £3,000. It would require a much larger rate to produce that sum, because there were a large number of properties in this country, both urban and rural, in regard to which rates were compounded for, and where, of course, a large reduction had to be made. There was also a considerable leakage from houses empty and from bad debts, and these made a very appreciable difference in the produce of a rate. What they wanted to understand was, did the Government mean that the rate, if everybody paid up to the full, with no bad debts, and no compounding, would be a rate of 3d. in the pound, or did they mean such a rate as would produce the sum mentioned in this Bill? He thought the right hon. Gentleman should make it perfectly clear what was the intention of the Government, lest some future critic, or rather obstructive, in the Education Department, should put a construction upon the Act which was not intended.

Sir J. GORST said he did not complain at all of the right hon. Member for Rotherham making a protest which he unfortunately was not able to make on the Second Reading, but he did not think it would be very proper for them to indulge in another Second Reading Debate at this stage. He rose to answer some of the questions put to him; the most important question was that which had just been put by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. He thought he had some right to complain of this question, as it had been put formerly by notice and answered in the most ample and clear manner, which not only he himself but the Committee of Council of Education had been able to suggest. There was no doubt whatever that the rate mentioned in the 97th section of the Act of 1870, and the rate mentioned in this Bill, was not, as the hon. Member for Shoreditch suggested, any imaginary or conventional rate; it was the rate which would actually produce the sum which was required. He hoped he had stated that clearly—["hear, hear!"]—but if there was any doubt about it, and anybody wanted to have a further or clearer statement, the best way would be to put a Question on the Paper. The Question would then be carefully considered, and the answer could be framed in legal language. That, he thought, was the only question of real importance which had been put in the course of this short discussion. Several other questions had been put, notably by the hon. and learned Member for Glamorganshire, with a view of trying to persuade the Government at a later stage to increase the relief which was given in this Bill. He heard all these sort of appeals without any emotion whatever—[laughter]—because he was in the position of the traveller with empty pockets who sang in the presence of a robber. [Laughter.] The House knew very well that he could not make grants of money, and that there was an authority higher than he. He had no power to propose Amendments which would enlarge the scope of this Bill. That was his answer to the proposal for including arrears. And so, with regard to the maximum, he could only say, "There it is." [Laughter.] He still thought it was a maximum which would not be reached, but if in time to come the maximum should ever be reached, he had no doubt that the wisdom of Parliament would devise some other means. He thought, on the whole, the Committee must admit that, as far as the money at the disposal of the Education Department had gone, it had been as wisely and successfully distributed as was possible. A great many cases of course were always brought up of hardship; some of them had been brought up more than once—the case of Aston, for instance. He had already dealt with this matter, however, on the Second Reading. He hoped the House would now allow the clause to pass.

COMMENCEMENT, CONSTRUCTION, AND SHORT TITLE.

This Act shall, from and after the twenty-ninth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, be construed as part of section ninety-seven of the Elementary Education Act 1870, and shall not extend to Scotland or Ireland, and may be cited as the Elementary Education Act 1897.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Rochester) rose to move the following new clause:—

CONTROL OF EDUCATION DEPARTMENT OVER RATE OF EXPENDITURE.

"The standard of rate expenditure in any school year at any school provided by a School Board receiving a contribution under this Act shall not, without the consent of the Education Department, exceed the standard of rate expenditure at such school during the school year last concluded; and no School Board shall, without such consent, receive from the rating authority for maintenance a larger sum than is sufficient, together with the contribution under this Act, to meet a rate expenditure according to such standard. The expression 'standard of rate expenditure' means the sum arrived at by dividing the amount received in any school from the rates and from any contribution under this Act and expended for the purposes of annual maintenance in any school year by the number of scholars in average attendance at such school during that year."

He said most people were under the impression that this Bill was intended for the relief of poverty-stricken districts, and the terms of the Bill had taken them rather by surprise. As a matter of fact, a very much larger number of School Boards were included in the scope of the Bill than could in any way be described as being in poverty-stricken districts. He did not object to the Bill on that ground. The Bill was introduced for the relief of the rates. ["Hear, hear!"] That was the reason put forward, he thought, by the Government, and certainly by numbers of Gentlemen supporting the Government. The question was, did many of the School Boards about to be relieved show in any sense that they felt the pressure of the rates? If so, they would have expected them to keep down the cost of education to a reasonable limit, and not to run into unnecessary luxury and extravagance as many of them had done. The Forest of Dean did not give cheap education, it was £2 6s. a head there; in Walthamstow it was as much as £2 8s. a head. These districts were going to be very heavily assisted under the Bill. In Leicester it was £2 7s. a head; in Gateshead £2 9s. This cost, moreover, was rising every day. Since 1891 the cost of education in the Borough of Nottingham had risen from £2 5s. to £2 11s. a head; in Leeds from £2 6s. to £2 11s. 6d.; and in West Ham from £2 9s. 6d. to £3 0s. 1d. He took his figures from the return which the Government had presented. It was very strange that School Boards which came for assistance to the Exchequer, should have a very expensive education, the cost of which was increasing year by year in this manner. Many of the School Boards in the large towns were not content to give merely a good education. If the West Ham School Board would limit its expenditure to £2 5s. per head, the School Board rate in West Ham would be reduced by 6½d. in the pound. Let the West Ham School Board give as good an education as they pleased, but when they voted money for School Boards who thought fit to spend money in this way, there was no assurance that the money would go to the relief of the ratepayers. Why should not any of these School Boards raise the expenditure still further? The West Ham School Board had not reached the London School Board figure of £3 7s. It might establish a higher grade school—or go in for specific subjects after the fashion of the London School Board. It might teach "the nature of hydrogen, its preparation, properties, and combustion; coal gas, its explosive powers; atmospheric air, carbonic gas in air, its use in plants; water ebullition, air pressure, boiling point, water apparently boiled by cooling, effect of sodium upon it." The teacher of these subjects was a sanguine man. He was of opinion that this instruction was not altogether thrown away, and said that girls who remaned two or three years in the classes always showed improvement, and in some cases they remembered well what they had learnt—perhaps 18 months afterwards. [Laughter.] If the House was going to vote this large sum of money because some girls remembered the nature of boiling point 18 months after they left school, the ratepayers would not be relieved and the money would be entirely wasted. Was there anything in the terms and conditions of the Bill which would lead School Boards to be economical? The conditions which determined whether a School Board was to receive assistance under the Bill or not were threefold. They did not depend merely on the number of the children or the wealth of the district —those were the principles upon which the old clause of 1897 was constructed—but they also depended on the height of the rates. The Nottingham School Board received substantial assistance, while the Sunderland Board received hardly anything at all. One of the reasons was that Nottingham gave a more expensive education. So, in order to get money from Parliament, there was a direct incentive to spend money. West Ham received 7s. and East Ham 4s., the reason that West Ham got most being that there 7s. per child was spent more than in East Ham. Every penny that the Leeds School Board added to the School Board rate would produce more than it had hitherto produced, because it would receive corresponding assistance from Parliament. So West Ham would receive 14 per cent. more and the Forest of Dean 25 per cent. more. The School Board of the Forest of Dean would be more than human if it did not raise its rates after the passing of this Bill. The Bill would offer a direct incentive to School Boards to raise their rates, because it would be remunerative to them to do so. He moved the new clause, because precaution should be taken that the money voted by the House did not go in unnecessary expenditure, but in relief of the taxpayer. Then the interests of the Voluntary Schools had to be considered. This Bill and the Voluntary Schools Bill should be considered together as forming one scheme on the part of the Government. He regretted that they had to discuss the sum devoted to the Board Schools from the point of view of Voluntary Schools. But this was because of the method which the Government had adopted through no fault of their own. They had said, "Let the Voluntary Schools look to the Imperial taxes as compensation for the advantage the Board Schools have from the rates." The friends of Voluntary Schools, therefore, looked with the greatest jealousy upon any special sum of money to be devoted to School Boards out of Imperial taxes, because it would clearly diminish the competitive power of the Voluntary Schools. For example, Yorkshire had a large number of School Boards which would be assisted under the Bill and receive a larger sum of money for education than they otherwise would, and this would enable them to compete much more successfully with the Voluntary Schools, and the competitive power of the latter schools would be correspondingly diminished. Parliament intended the money voted under this Bill to be for the relief of the rates, and he proposed by the clause to give the Education Department power to see that the money went as Parliament directed. He should have been better pleased if the power could be given to the county and District Councils, which were representative of the ratepayers. He suggested that course, but for obvious reasons it was ruled out of order. Under the circumstances there was a good logical reason why the Education Department should be the controlling authority, and he was supported by a precedent set by the Vice President of the Council, who had inserted an Amendment in the Bill giving the Department control, to some extent, over the expenditure of the Boards. The clause was an extension of the same principle, and was intended to give Parliament the control over School Board expenditure which it ought to have. ["Hear, hear!"] Unless some clause of this kind were accepted he was confident the only result of the Bill would be in an enormous number of cases to raise still further expenditure which had already run to extreme limits in a large number of School Boards, and the ratepayers would be no better off than they were at the present moment. He begged to move that the clause be Read a Second time.

Sir J. GORST, in resisting the Amendment, pointed out that, even if the clause were passed, the Education Department would not exercise control over all School Board expenditure, but only over the expenditure of those which were subject to the operations of the Bill, and which composed a fraction only of the School Boards of the country. It was quite clear that the proper people to exercise control over the expenditure of the School Boards were the ratepayers. ["Hear, hear!"] They had the most complete power of electing persons on the School Board to represent them, in whom they had confidence, and he could not say he felt any strong sympathy with them if, having the power to protect themselves, they did not exercise it. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not think the particular class of school to which the Amendment applied was that which required control from the central Department, nor did he think the central Department would undertake to exercise it. What was practically suggested was that the Education Department should fix for every School Board district in the country the proper amount per scholar to expend. [Viscount Cranborne dissented.] It was the expenditure per scholar that was controlled, and which was not to be increased without the consent of the Department. That would involve in the case of each School Board that came under the clause the consideration of what was the proper rate to be expended. That was a matter which it was quite impossible for the Education Department or a central office in London to decide. As he had often tried to explain, the rate of expenditure, quite irrespective of the efficiency of the school, varied enormously in different places, and the greatest expenditure per scholar was not where they had the great schools, but in the small, scattered, poor parishes where, perhaps, only 20 children had to be provided for by one master or mistress, and where, consequently, the rate of expenditure per child ran up to an amount far in excess of what it did in West Ham, London, or in great cities. ["Hear, hear!"] Another thing to be remembered was that the rate of expenditure really did not depend upon any determination made either by the School Board or the Education Department. They could not fix their rate of expenditure—because it depended upon economic considerations—upon the laws of supply and demand. The great cause of the increase of expenditure was the increase of teachers' salaries. Teachers' salaries depended upon the economic law of supply and demand, and all the regulations of the Education Department and School Boards throughout the country would not prevent the alteration of these economic laws. If the demand for teachers was great and the supply was small, the salaries must necessarily increase. The noble lord was mistaken in supposing that the cost of education depended upon the kind of education given in their great schools. Leeds was a town which received assistance under this Bill, and the noble Lord had alluded to the fact that Leeds had a higher grade school. Yes, it had; but that higher grade school was no burden to the ratepayers. Indeed, so far from being a burden to the ratepayers, it was a profit. They had an immense demand in great towns for secondary education. They had nobody there to supply it except the School Board, which had undoubtedly the means of investing the capital of the ratepayers in secondary education; fees were charged, the people were glad to pay, and actually a profit was made for the ratepayers of Leeds by the fact that the School Board discharged the function of providing secondary education. ["Hear, hear!"] No mistake could be greater than to imagine that because a place gave a high education and efficient instruction to the children, that therefore the expenditure was extravagant, or that a reduction of that education would lessen the expense. ["Hear, hear!"] He agreed with the noble Lord in the statement that children left school too early. They were now turned out of school in many cases at 11 years of age. He admitted the force of that objection, which he should remedy, not by reducing the quality of the education, but by keeping the children longer at school. [Cheers.]

Mr. GRIFFITH-BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not seen his way to accept this Amendment, which carried out what was intended by the Bill, and gave an absolute guarantee that the money voted under it should go to the relief of the ratepayers. He could not understand the ground upon which the right hon. Gentleman refused to accept the Amendment. He had told them the Government could not accept the new clause because it would be giving the Department control only over a small fraction of the School Boards' expenditure. But the reason why such control should be given over that small fraction was that in these limited cases an extra grant was to be made, and for a special purpose. For his part he should certainly be glad to see some limit put to the expenses of School Boards, either by the control of the Department, or, if that was impossible, by local bodies. Surely when an extra grant was being given for a special purpose it was not seeking too much to ask that the Department should have the right to control the expenditure if they thought proper, and to see that the money was devoted to the purpose for which Parliament intended it. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the Department could not do it. Why were they incompetent? They were not incompetent to see that a large number of conditions were fulfilled in the case of the Voluntary Schools which got relief under the Voluntary Schools Act, and if they interposed those conditions in that Act as a guarantee for its doing what Parliament intended, why was it not right and proper, and why were the Education Department incompetent to see that conditions were fulfilled in this Bill to carry out the intentions of Parliament? The Duke of Devonshire, replying to a deputation at the Foreign Office on the 26th February, said that the matter with which the present Bill dealt was almost entirely a ratepayers' question. That being so, he asked the Committee to regard it as a ratepayers' question, and see that the money went to the relief of the ratepayers. Neither he nor the noble Lord desired to bar the rogress of education; nothing was fur-her from their wishes. They had the uthority of the Duke of Devonshire him-elf, and of everybody who had discussed he Bill, for saying that it was not a Measure for the furtherance or efficiency f education, but merely for the relief f ratepayers. That being so he asked hy should they not try to see that that bject was carried out. If the clause vere adopted it would not in any way mpede the progress of education. It vas really permissive. It said that the Education Department might limit the ate of expenditure if it thought fit, and aw sufficient reasons for it. They had o look at this Bill from the point of view of the Voluntary Schools Bill. In the latter Bill they tried to make up the normous disparities which existed be-ween the cost of each child in the Voluntary and the Board Schools, by iving the Voluntary Schools 5s. per head. Parliament had endeavoured to make up the disparity of 11s. between the cost of ducation in Board and in Voluntary chools by giving 5s. per scholar to the atter. But if they allowed the money ranted by this Bill, which averaged 1s. er scholar in attendance in Board chools, to be used in creating fresh com-etiton with Voluntary Schools, the re-ult would be that the advantage which Voluntary Schools would receive would nly represent 4s. per scholar. There ere cases where School Boards had de-ermined to try and drive Voluntary chools out of existence by unfair com-etition. ["Oh!"] Having tried to stop that by giving a small grant to Voluntary chools, were they now going to put noney into the pockets of certain School Boards in order that they might use it o renew that competition? ["Hear, ear!"] He would support the Amend-nent because it carried out the policy f the Government—the maintenance of he dual system of education in this ountry.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Ham-ts, Poplar) said the amount involved in he Bill was equal only to about the verage annual increase in the School Board rate. Therefore the additional ompetition which it would create was ractically infinitesimal.

*VISCOUNT CRANBORNE: In par-icular cases it is by no means in-nitesimal.

MR. BUXTON said it would be found that the grant under the Bill would go chiefly to places where competition was least felt. With the exception of one or two places like West Ham and Tottenham, where they might take it for granted that a large amount of the money would go in relief of rates, very few of the great School Boards would be able by means of this grant to burst out into wild and overwhelming extravagance. In his opinion, the way to improve national education in this country was not by curtailing the powers of expenditure upon that education. They must in this matter trust the ratepayers. If in some cases the ratepayers were apathetic that was their affair; and it was for the noble Lord and his friends to stir them up, and to induce them to protest against the burden of the rate. Taking the system of education throughout, he denied that the School Boards were extravagant. The bulk of the expenditure was forced upon them. In many cases the ratepayers were unwilling to spend these large sums, and only sanctioned them because of the necessity for improving education. It must be obvious that they could not deal with the matter in this small way. They must deal with it on a general basis, not in regard to this £110,000, but in regard to the £3,500,000 spent by the ratepayers under the system of national education.

MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University) said he thought hon. Gentlemen opposite had failed to appreciate the point of the new clause. The object of the Bill, he understood, was to redress some inequalities which were supposed to exist between the Voluntary Schools which had been assisted and certain Board Schools. But, if in doing that they undid the work they had already done, they would stultify the work of Parliament. The intolerable strain from which the Voluntary Schools had sought relief arose in great measure from the fact that the School Board expenditure in many districts was so high that the Voluntary Schools had to raise large sums from voluntary sources to meet the competition. Parliament had relieved that strain, but if they raised the School Board expenditure again in districts where they had just assisted the Voluntary Schools, they would be undoing with one hand what they had done with the other. This proposal had been described as an attempt to limit the rate of School Board expenditure. Nothing could be less consistent with the facts. A correspondent had called his attention to the case of Leeds. He should never have thought of calling Leeds School Board necessitous, but under this Bill it received £6,000, whereas the Voluntary Schools of Leeds only received £5,000. At the present moment the School Board of Leeds was favourable to Voluntary Schools, and no doubt, in the existing circumstances, the £6,000 would go in reduction of rates. But it was quite possible that at the election next November the tables would be turned, and the majority now on the side of the Voluntary Schools would become a majority on the other side. What was to prevent the new School Board from using this £6,000 in producing excessive competition with the Voluntary Schools of Leeds?

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield) observed that it was reported that the noble Lord the Member for Rochester had said at a recent public meeting that the Voluntary Schools Act had "smashed up" the Education Act of 1870; but apparently he now thought that the work of destruction was incomplete, and therefore he had proposed this clause. It was practically a reproduction of one of the worst provisions of the Bill of last year, and one which had largely helped to bring about its defeat. Let the Committee consider the irony of the situation. The Government had been appealed to for pecuniary aid by the supporters of Voluntary Schools, and had given them substantial relief; but they had originally no intention of doing anything for the Board Schools. They were, however, shamed by public opinion into the production of the wretchedly inadequate Bill now before the House. Thereupon the noble Lord sought to convert it into a disabling Measure—to turn what was meant to be an olive branch into a rod for chastising luxurious School Boards. Why was it wished to intervene between the School Boards and the ratepayers? The noble Lord had said that County and District Councils represented the ratepayers better than School Boards; but why? All three were equally elected by the ratepayers, and those who disapproved of the expenditure of School Boards could dismiss the members at the next election and put others in their place. The ratepayers might safely be entrusted with the duty of seeing that there was no unnecessary expenditure on education. They were indeed too prone to limit it, and that was the great weapon of the opponents of School Boards, who appealed to the niggardliness and small-mindedness of ratepayers to prevent their coming into existence. He thought that that part of the noble Lord's speech which objected to the higher education of School Boards came with an ill grace from one who had had all the advantages of high culture, and yet seemed to grudge similar opportunities to the working classes. He (the speaker) regarded the clause as an anti-educational clause—a proposal which would stereotype education and stunt the growth of our educational system, and as such he hoped it would be decisively rejected. He was amused with the fact that both the noble Lord and the hon. Member for the Tunbridge Division had kept back till the end of their speeches what was probably the motive of their action—it was a dread of the competition between the Voluntary and the Board Schools. Their objections were, in fact, directed against the entire Bill. They wished the Voluntary Schools to have everything and the Board Schools nothing; but that was a policy which would have very little sympathy in that House, and still less in the country.

*SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (London University) did not believe that this money would, as a rule, be extravagantly spent. He hoped it would go to improve education. He might remind the noble Lord the Member for Rochester that elementary science was the subject which children found to be most interesting. In one district where lectures on this subject were delivered, mothers found it necessary to change their washing-day so that it should not clash with the teaching, so great was the daughters' interest in it. The clause would deprive the ratepayers of that right of self-government which was so dear to the Anglo-Saxon race. He believed that the clause would either be inoperative or harmful, and he therefore hoped that it would not be pressed to a division.

*Mr. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): observed that the noble Lord the Member for Rochester wished the Committee to believe that much of this money would be spent in teaching girls specific subjects, including the properties of hydrogen and the gymnastics of the boiling point. But that would not be the case. Last year there were only 3,850 who were taught science at all; 23,000 were taught mechanics, and 162,000 were taught specific subjects. Only one child in 300 in public elementary schools received that kind of advanced instruction to which the noble Lord contended that this money would be wastefully applied. It might be found convenient in some Board Schools to add to a class of boys some few girls who wished to have the advantage of instruction in chemistry and mechanics, but as a rule the instruction given to girls under the head of extra subjects was instruction in domestic economy, physiology, hygiene, cookery, laundry, dairy, and needlework. Those were the subjects which were taught, and not the properties of hydrogen or the gymnastics of the boiling point. He was sure the noble Lord had no intention to mislead the Committee, and he hoped he would accept his correction. The interests of the Voluntary Schools had been cared for to some extent, and he would beg the noble Lord to allow the interests of the Board Schools to be cared for to some extent under this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"]

Lord HUGH CECIL (Greenwich) said he believed that in many respects the energy of the Board Schools as well as their money was frittered away on things which really had no educational value, but which happened to be the fancy of this or that educational expert. The peculiarity of a School Board was that it must be composed of educational experts, who only wished to spend as much money as possible on education, and could not look at the matter from an economical point of view. His right hon. Friend the Vice President complained that the Amendment would only give the Department control over a certain number of schools; but the case of his own Bill was that a certain number of School Boards were in a peculiar position. If so, it was quite fair to treat them in a peculiar way. ["Hear, hear!"] If his right hon. Friend objected to deal with certain schools in a peculiar way, why did he not include all Board Schools in this Bill? [Opposition cheers.] If this Bill had not been introduced for the relief of the rates, but for the general value of education, then his right hon. Friend ought to have included London, and Hull, and Manchester, as well as Leeds and Nottingham. ["Hear, hear!"] The only defence of the Bill was that relief was to be given to poor ratepayers. If so, was it not right to secure that the money voted for that purpose should go where it was intended to go? His right hon. Friend further said that the Department would be incapable of carrying out the work which the Amendment proposed to put upon it. "How art thou fallen from Heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" [Laughter.] How have the Department changed! They had now become merely ignoramuses; they did not understand political economy, they did not understand the law of supply and demand, they could not contemplate the possibility of a successful argument with bodies less superior in knowledge and intention. [Laughter.] Surely, if the Education Department was equal to the elaborate control which was to be exercised over Voluntary Schools under the Act just passed, and the task of accurately forming a judgment on the question of what constituted a "necessitous" School Board—[laughter]—and he would like his right hon. Friend, by-the-bye, to explain how they were going to find out what constituted a "necessitous" School Board—[Opposition cheers]—they were capable of deciding what was a proper rate of expenditure. It appeared to him that the one was preliminary to the other. He was quite unable to understand why their intellects should have suddenly shrunk like a magic wallet—[laughter]—and why they should have become incapable of carrying out the functions assigned to them by the Amendment. He believed that in some of the large towns, particularly in Leeds, this Bill would make a very important difference to the value of the grant given under the Voluntary Schools Act, and would thus create great discontent among the supporters of Voluntary Schools. They would find, he believed, that the grant under the Voluntary Schools Act was too small, or in any case that it was an inadequate substitute for the rates, and, therefore, Board Schools would still have an immense advantage in the case of competition. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. STUART thought that everyone on his side of the House would have listened with great satisfaction to the speech which emanated from the Vice President. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of his occupation of that office had made a number of very good speeches on education, and had produced some educational gems. The only thing he regretted was that the setting in which they were placed was sometimes so inadequate. It had been argued that this money was to go to the relief of the ratepayers, but he wished the House to observe that there was as much need of money for the improvement of education in the areas that would be benefited by the Bill as for the relief of the ratepayers. If it was laid down that this money was not to be spent in improving education, much of the benefit of the Bill would be taken away. If hon. Members on the other side of the House were so anxious to prevent Board Schools competing with Voluntary Schools, he was surprised that they did not side with the Opposition when the Voluntary Schools Act was before the House in trying to secure the maintenance of Voluntary subscriptions. ["Hear, hear!"] He maintained that education in all directions was always a necessity, and would always remain so, and the desire for increasing the excellence of education arose not from the requirements of the Department, but from the wish of the people of the country generally. ["Hear, hear!"] He believed there was a great deal of mistaken energy in education, but that was the result of the Code; but, if the House was desirous of making education what it ought to be, they would not do so by cutting off money that might be improperly spent, but by seeing that the money was spent properly. He believed the whole of this Debate might have been concluded by the speech of the Vice President, because it accurately gauged the situation, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to keep his Friends on the Front Bench up to the spirit of the speech he had delivered. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR FRANCIS POWELL (Wigan) said that he could not support the Amendment. The Bill had been introduced by the Government as an act of justice to the Board Schools, and he was sure that the Debates which took place on the last Bill as well as on this showed that the School Boards enjoyed a larger amount of confidence, even of affection, among Members on that side of the House than there had been reason to suppose. He greatly regretted that any proposal had been made from that side of the House to limit the generosity of the Government towards School Boards, or to minimise the expression of confidence in them. As to the administration of the grant, the Voluntary Schools Act was framed on the hypothesis that the Government was not able to administer each association of schools, and the Government had only to distribute the money in accordance with the recommendations of the associations. There was another argument worthy of consideration. Could the Government carry out the provisions of the Bill, supposing they had the administrative capacity? He believed that no Government, however anxious to do so, could perform such a task. It was beyond the power of any Government. No administration could be strong enough to say to a School Board representing a great constituency that their expenditure was excessive. The work would have to be accomplished through the inspectors, whose duty it was to keep up the standard of education. If this Bill passed the inspectors would say that the standard was too high, and the expenditure too great; and he did not think it was possible to obtain such services from the inspectors. Something had been said about Leeds; but why was the claim of Leeds so great? Because the children were so many. There were 42,872 children there, and, therefore, it was clear that the sum assigned must be large. The sum for West Ham was also large because the children there were numerous. There were, however, a comparatively small number of great towns which would have the benefit of the Bill. Personally he had some anxiety as to Lancashire, because it was there that the competition was strongly felt. In the county of Lancaster there were only four districts which obtained any advantage under the Bill; the total amount of aid given to the Lancashire School Boards was £291. He thought that a figure like that ought to console his friends in Lancashire. The majority of places deriving advantage under the Bill were small, and the sums were so insignificant that they could not disturb the balance of competition between the School Boards and the Voluntary Schools. He hoped that the Committee would accept the advice of his right hon. Friend, and would not accept the Amendment.

*Sir C. DILKE invited the noble Lord (Viscount Cranborne) to visit some of the schools in the poorer districts. The schools in the poorest districts were of different types, one represented by the schools in West Ham and in the neighbourhood of the Metropolis, and the other by the schools in Cornwall and the district which he represented. But those poor districts had one point in common. They were districts where generally the rate was so high that anything like extravagance was utterly out of the question. They were districts also which would educate children who worked elsewhere either at the time, or who would go elsewhere to work as soon as they were educated. The pressure of the rates in those districts was so extreme that there was no risk of extravagance at all; a rigid, parsimonious, penurious economy was much more to be feared. In the poorest districts, moreover, all the local authorities took the same view, and they would be equally fair about the relief to the rates. In the Forest of Dean School Boards the advantage would amount to 7d. in the rate, and this was a district where the ordinary rates were 8s. in the pound, and in the next half-year would be 9s. He believed it would be found that in West Ham also the representative authorities, however elected, all took the same view, and it was a delusion to believe in the existence of extravagance in those districts.

*Sir W. HART DYKE said that he was opposed to the proposed clause being added to the Bill. Although the Government had done much to reduce the inequality between the School Boards and the Voluntary Schools, it was yet suggested that they took back with one hand what they gave with the other. He did not think that his noble Friend ought to be afraid of this when they looked at the figures and compared the sum allocated in each case. If his noble Friend wished to apply his principle he must apply it to all the Board Schools of the country. That would be intelligible, but he pointed out that in this case the Bill would be a grievous educational failure in many of the poor districts of the country. One word as to the inequality under this Bill. No doubt it was true. The case of Leeds had been quoted over and over again, but he did not think it necessary to detain the Committee on that point.

*Mr. ERNEST GRAY said he should be sorry to allow this Amendment to pass without saying a word upon it. He admired the courage with which the Amendment was brought forward, but regretted that such an Amendment had been moved from those Benches. He condemned the Amendment, as not only unpracticable, but an unnecessary interference with the rights of the ratepayers. He thought the Amendment would give some colour to the allegations which were sometimes made against the Unionist Party to the effect that they were opposed to the progress of national education. The Amendment was in his view totally unnecessary, and would not accomplish the object which the noble Lord had in view. It was ridiculous to talk of extravagance in these heavily-rated districts, for the persons who would be returned to these School Boards would be those who gave an unlimited number of promises to keep down the rate. He feared if the Amendment were carried it would either be inoperative and useless or effective, and, therefore, objectionable. Whatever schools they were in, whether Board or Voluntary, they wanted the children educated. ["Hear, hear!"]

Viscount CRANBORNE said, before the Committee went to a division, he desired to say that he had no wish to bring any charge against poor Board Schools; but it did seem to him that, when those Boards came to ask for money, Parliament had a right to see how the money was spent. Let it be understood that everyone who voted against this Amendment set himself against any reduction which, he believed, the ratepayers were demanding on every hand. [Cries of "No, no!"] He believed this Amendment was popular with the ratepayers.

Question put, "That the Clause be read a Second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 20; Noes, 294.—(Division List, No. 199.)

The announcement of the numbers was received with derisive Opposition cheers.

On the Question, "That this be the preamble,"

Mr. J. SAMUEL (Stockton) asked whether average attendance would be calculated in the same way as under the principal grant, or as under the fee grant?

Sir J. GORST said that, as he understood it, "average attendance" in all but one of the Education Acts meant average attendance according to the minutes of the Committee of Council in existence at the time. The single exception was the Fee Grant Act, where "average attendance" was calculated according to the rules existing when the Act was passed.

Mr. J. SAMUEL said that he had a letter from the Education Department in respect of a particular School Board, the terms of which were at variance with the right hon. Gentleman's statement.

Sir J. GORST said that he should have had notice of such a matter; but if a Question were put on the Paper, he would give an answer on which the hon. Member could rely.

Mr. ACLAND pointed out that, the grant under the Free Education Act being governed permanently by the Code for the year preceding the passage of that Act, great hardship was sometimes involved, both to Board Schools and Voluntary Schools. He would suggest a little Bill enabling the Department to alter the rules in regard to average attendance under the Free Education Act.

Sir J. GORST said that in the Bill of last year such an amendment was proposed, and might now have become law, had the Bill not been refused by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. [Laughter.]

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, with an Amendment; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock, and to be printed.—[Bill 237.]

Viscount Cranborne.

Mr. ACLAND: Will the Bill be the first Order?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: Yes. I hope that will not be inconvenient.

WAYS AND MEANS (BUDGET RESOLUTIONS).

TEA.

"That the Duty of Customs now payable on Tea shall continue to be charged, levied, and paid on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say): Tea . . the pound . Four Pence."

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.) proposed to leave out the words "Four Pence," and to insert instead thereof the words "Two Pence." He said the Chancellor of the Exchequer commenced his Budget statement the other day by a reference to the record of prosperity which he had to explain to the Committee last year. The revenue of the country, he said, speaking of 1895-96, had never been so large, the expenditure had been immense, and yet never before had so much been devoted to the reduction of the National Debt. Financially, the right hon. Gentleman said, we seemed then to be on the crest of the wave, and it would have been rash to anticipate that we should rise any higher; and yet, he added, we had done so. He told them that, in spite of political circumstances in the United States, which for a time had paralysed trade, in spite of distress in India, in spite of anxieties in the East of Europe, the revival of trade which had begun in the summer of 1895 had been maintained. The foreign trade of 1896 had exceeded that of 1895 by 5 per cent., and the increase in volume had been even greater than the increase in price. The home trade was not less flourishing; the diminished number of failures, the improved banking and railway returns, better employment in the skilled labour market, and, lastly but not least, a good wheat crop and better prices for it, all indicated the prosperity of the country. Surely such halcyon days as the right hon. Gentleman described furnished the occasion for some measure of relief to the taxpayer. The Chancellor of the Exchequer considered himself bound to be cautious in 1896, and he said he was bound to be cautious now. Of course, anyone in the position of a Chancellor of the Exchequer was bound to be cautious, not only this year and last year, but every year; but, he submitted, that caution was not altogether incompatible with occasional reductions of taxation. He also told them the other day that after this exercise of caution on his part the receipts from the income tax had largely increased, so that they had yielded more than they had ever yielded before, and had more than made up the remissions granted by his predecessor in 1894. Moreover, the Exchequer receipts from the Death Duties had very considerably exceeded his estimates, and the right hon. Gentleman very frankly admitted that he had underestimated the Death Duties. So, alike, from the living and the dead, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had gathered in more than ever he anticipated. But this year again he told them he had to be cautious, and why? Because, although tobacco exceeded his estimate, it only produced £265,000 more than in the year 1895-96; because, where in the case of wine he had looked for a reduction of receipts he had actually obtained £40,000 more than last year, and then, as he said, it was only £75,000 above his estimate; and, thirdly, because tea, which did not disappoint him by one single penny, only brought to the revenue £54,000 more than in the previous year, from all of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer deduced the conclusion that it looked as if the times were slackening, and as if in the matter of Customs revenue we had reached high-water mark. The conclusion appeared to him to be a little startling when they considered it side by side with the fact that in this very Budget the right hon. Gentleman had estimated for no less than £700,000 of income tax alone in excess of his previous estimate, and for £250,000 beyond his inflated receipts of last year. If a reduction of taxation was not to come now when we had reached a level higher than was ever anticipated, when we had reached high-water mark, when was it to come? Were we, in times of peace, to await the outbreak of war? were we in days of admitted prosperity to await the advent of evil days, before we began to look for a reduction of taxation? This, in his opinion, was a proper occasion for a reduction, and he should venture to propose a reduction, moderate in amount, calculated to afford relief to the greatest possible number of those most in need of relief, and a reduction which, while it applied to all divisions of the United Kingdom in common, might be expected to afford some larger relief to Ireland than to Great Britain, and he hoped to show some ground why an Irish Member might be excused if he regarded that as a not unimportant aspect of the question. The figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer showed that a very much larger proportion of revenue was derived from indirect taxation than from direct taxation, the ratio being about 49¼ to 36. The burden of indirect taxation bore heavily upon the comparatively poorer classes, and therefore Ireland, by reason of the fact that she had a larger proportion of poorer classes than Great Britain, felt more keenly than Great Britain the inequity of the incidence as between direct and indirect taxation. He sought, therefore, a reduction of indirect taxation which should afford relief where it was most wanted, but should also go at least some little way towards redressing the inequity or incapacity to bear taxation and the actual burden of Great Britain and Ireland respectively. Naturally the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not allow the great opportunity which the Budget statement of this year afforded him to pass by without casting a glance over the last 60 years. The retrospect afforded him grounds to refer with pardonable pride to many subjects of congratulation. At the beginning of the period the export trade of the United Kingdom amounted to £42,000,000; it was now £240,000,000. The imports had risen meanwhile from £67,000,000 to £442,000,000. Where there were five depositors in the savings banks then there were now 43, and the population of the United Kingdom had increased enormously. The right hon. Gentleman was able to sing a kind of financial pæan upon the prospect between now and then. The felicitations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to that part of the United Kingdom called Great Britain were amply justified, but were they equally justified with regard to Ireland? Within the first decade of the 60 years the population of Ireland was some 8,300,000; for more than 50 years, without one single period of recovery or halt, the population had dwindled year by year until some four millions out of her former population of 8¼ millions had disappeared. Whilst they had been increasing in Great Britain the effectiveness of the wealth-producing classes, it was precisely those classes that Ireland had been losing. And yet what had they recently seen? The Government gathering in the repayments of the money grudgingly advanced for seed potatoes to the impoverished people of the West. In different parts of the country the very workhouses were being seized for debt, and the Board of Works, as mortgagees in possession, were foreclosing on the Lismore, Dungarvan and Waterford Railway. In 1837 Ireland contributed £4,496,000 to a total revenue of £50,000,000, or less than 9 per cent. Now, with all this extraordinary increase of population and wealth on the one hand, and of deterioration and exhaustion on the other, Ireland was pay-£50,000,000, or less than 9 per cent. to a total revenue now more than doubled. By reason of the financial treatment and the position forced upon Ireland by the Government and Legislature of this country, Ireland had been suffering from a sort of financial hæmorrhage which had always kept her poor. The Act of Union, apart from its provisions with regard to fiscal affairs, had most injurious results for Ireland in a totally different way. It was the first of a series of great measures of disestablishment, each and every one of which had wrought and was working results disastrous to Ireland. The first necessary and natural sequel of that Measure was the removal from Ireland of large numbers of her propertied classes, whose incomes had before then been spent and circulated in Ireland, to the maintenance and development of industries there. Ever since the Union the finances of Ireland had been administered from Westminster, and from the first days to the present decade they had been messed and muddled. Many persons required to be cautioned upon the readiness with which they received some official statements with reference to the accounts between the two countries. He gave two illustrations, one drawn from the first decade and the other from the present decade. In the year 1806 that House appointed a Committee to examine and report "on the joint charges of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st January, 1801, to the 1st January, 1806, the proportions defrayed, and the balance remaining due from either party." The Committee reported, and they were unable to report the joint charge on Great Britain and Ireland, or to ascertain the relative situation of the two countries as to their expenditure, because the accounts furnished to them from Ireland, or on account of Ireland, they could not make head or tail of. They were faulty in construction and formation, and the Committee had to content itself with examining witnesses as to the keeping and auditing of the accounts for Ireland, and asking its Chairman to move for certain accounts during the following Session. The following Session never came. There was a Dissolution in October of that year, and he could not ascertain that the accounts in question were ever actually moved for. In the present decade there was a Home Rule Bill introduced at a time when Mr. Gladstone, the experienced financier, was the Prime Minister, and when the great Death Duties Chancellor of the Exchequer was in office. The Budget for Ireland framed in connection with the Bill only came to a few millions, and yet in one single item on one side of the account the Government was out no less than a sum exceeding a third of a million! Many English gentlemen seemed to think that poor Ireland had been somehow or other a continuous charge upon rich Great Britain. There was never, he thought, a more unfounded notion. In 1833 the first of the returns which really illustrated the situation well showed a balance of £11,389,179, which had been sent from Ireland to the English Exchequer, and how many tens of millions they had been drawing since he was not at the moment prepared to say; but it must very considerably exceed 100 millions sterling. The English Exchequer always had had a large balance of Irish money in their hands. All the money that had been spent in Ireland had been Irish money, and he defied anybody to prove that one single penny of English money had ever been spent in Ireland since the Union.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: I must remind the hon. Member that the general financial relations between Great Britain and Ireland cannot be discussed on this Resolution. The only question now before the Committee is in regard to the imposition of the duty on tea.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said his notion was to lead up to the conclusion that in dealing with indirect taxation, including the duty on tea, the special circumstances of Ireland must needs be taken account of, and that it was impossible to appreciate the situation without having regard to that which had led up to them. However, he would content himself by drawing attention to the fact that from Ireland there had been continually flowing into this country a double stream—rental on the one hand and fiscal on the other. The second process of depletion from which Ireland was suffering at this moment, which reduced her tax-bearing capacity, and which had to be borne in mind when they were considering whether they would impose a duty of 4d. in the pound on the consumers of tea in Ireland, was the Disestablishment of the Church. The Established Church was endowed out of Irish property, and its income was spent in Ireland. They disestablished it and its officials, from sextons to archbishops, took their money, and in large numbers they removed from Ireland, generally to this country, leaving Ireland charged, as it was now, with the repayment of the amount to the National Debt Commissioners here. Now they had seen started a third of these processes of depletion in the disestablishment of the existing class of landlords. For the purpose of what was pleasantly called "settling the land question," they had devised a system of land purchase under which the former owner received the price of his property obtained by loan from the National Debt Commissioners. He had now lost his status as landlord, and in a large number of cases he went away, taking his money with him. But his former property, now in the hands of his old tenants, remained a charge for the repayment of the capital money so advanced. That charge constituted a further drain upon the resources of Ireland which would run for the next 49 or 50 years. He thought he had said enough to show that in any suggested modification, however slight, of the existing system of taxation, its effect upon Ireland was a matter deserving of the first consideration. He came next to the question of the principle upon which, and the mode in which, relief should be given. In reference to this point, he had read very carefully the speeches and writings of several English Members of that House, and especially of the hon. Member for Bodmin. The hon. Member told his constituents at Liskeard that the true principle of taxation was the principle of equal sacrifice—a principle which required that the richer a man was the bigger should be his proportionate payment. This was a true and a good principle if they started fair, if their initial situation was just all round, but in the present case the condition precedent necessary for the fair application of such a principle did not exist. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bodmin did not answer his own question, "Is proportionate payment obtained now?" for he went on to say:—

> "If so, then there is no injustice, because the poor man, be he English, Irish, or Scotch, pays out of his poverty, and the rich man out of his riches."

The right hon. Gentleman said "if." The French had a saying that "With an 'if' you could put Paris in a bottle." But in truth and in fact the rich man did not pay according to his riches, while the poor man out of his poverty paid a most disproportionate amount to the revenue; and as the people of Ireland were, taken all round, poorer than the people of England, they naturally felt the pressure more. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded to argue that if Irishmen were overtaxed, that circumstance was due to their larger consumption of whisky. But this was not a question between Irishmen, Scotchmen and Englishmen who drank spirits. No one suggested that the Irishman who drank whisky in Ireland should be treated differently from the Irishman who drank whisky in England; or, indeed, that there should be any reduction in the spirit duty at all. But the principle of taxing intoxicating liquors was not equally applied. He could not understand why so many Members were so solicitous about the sobriety of whisky drinkers, or why they conceived that Irishmen or Scotchmen were more amenable to fiscal repressive measures in the interests of sobriety when they did not extend the same measures to Englishmen. There were hundreds of thousands, and even millions of people in this country, who consumed intoxicating drinks in the form of beer at one-sixth of the duty which was collected from those who took alcohol in the shape of spirits. But this was not a question of alcohol only. When it was shown that in the matter of alcohol there was differential treatment according to the mode of consumption, only part of the case was stated. Was tobacco taxed in order to reduce consumption, or to promote a right way of living? Was it deemed to be in the fitness of things that smokers should be taxed in order that non-smokers might be benefited? What was to be said about tea, of which the people in Ireland consumed more per head, though they consumed less alcohol per head, than the people of Great Britain? He asked whether anybody maintained that the hard-working washerwoman was fairly taxed by means of tea according to her resources when compared with the rich man or the poor man, who did not drink tea, and possibly regarded it as something fit for Orientals and old women? Again, were coffee and chicory and dried fruits taxed with the object of either promoting a right way of living or diminished consumption? No; one and all of these taxes were open to a common objection.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: Order, order! The hon. Member is not entitled to take a general survey of the taxation of this country on the Resolution before the Committee. That Resolution relates only to the tea duty, and the hon. Gentleman must confine himself to that question.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said he understood it had been the custom that a general discussion on taxation should take place on the first question put from the Chair.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: No; the general custom which has been followed this year is that the general discussion is taken until a Resolution is passed. The first Resolution, the income tax Resolution, has been passed by the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said he would observe the ruling of the Chair. Tea was the luxury of the poor, and it was not the luxury of the poor, but the luxuries of the rich that should be taxed. It would be less unjust to increase the taxation on man-servants than it would be to maintain the present tea duty. He thought he had already shown that any reduction in taxation that could be made should take place in the indirect rather than in the direct taxation division of the revenue. There was some ground for relieving the numerous consumers throughout the country who at present contributed beyond their means as compared with the more affluent members of the community, and he had good reason for urging that any alteration in the duty should be such as would afford equal relief to Ireland to that which was afforded to Great Britain, and even more. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer might say that if a man proposed a reduction of taxation, he must be prepared to show that there is room for the reduction. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that last year he had calculated a balance for contingencies of a little over £100,000, with the result that he had a balance considerably exceeding two millions. This year the right hon. Gentleman estimated for a balance for contingencies of £500,000. There was no reason whatever to suppose that the present year would be less prosperous than the past. Very opportunely there had been issued a small Parliamentary Paper giving the figures of the trade and navigation of the United Kingdom during the first four months of the current year. What had been the Treasury experience of the prospects of this year? He found that on coffee, currants, raisins, tea, spirits, wine, and tobacco, there was a substantial increase—not of five per cent. as last year showed upon the previous year—but of something nearer eight per cent. There was abundant reason, therefore, for concluding that the balance for contingencies of half-a-million, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer anticipated on his present Budget, would considerably exceed two and a-half millions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would assuredly obtain a sum of more than two millions in excess of his balance for contingencies, and, therefore, he was well able to reduce the tax on tea by one-half.

On the return of the CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS, after the usual interval,

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) observed that the hon. Member for East Donegal, in moving to reduce the duty on tea from fourpence to twopence per pound, had raised the great question of the relative incidence of direct and indirect taxation. This was a subject in which he had himself, for a long time, taken great interest, and in 1889 he ventured to bring the matter before the House. He then argued that, owing to the system of direct and indirect taxation, the poor man paid more out of his one pound than did the rich man out of his many pounds. Since then, however, it was only right to say that a good deal had been done in the direction of reducing indirect taxation, so that it should fall less upon the poor. The question was whether they had gone far enough in this direction? He said that the inequalities of taxation still existed, and that, to a certain extent, the poor man still paid more out his small income, relatively per pound, than the rich man. But when they came to consider how the taxation was to be adjusted and put right they encountered many difficulties, and he thought he should be able to show that, by the Amendment before the Committee, the anomalies that would be produced would be as great as those which existed now. It was impossible by any system of indirect taxation to get a theoretical and absolutely accurate arrangement by which the incidence of taxation was proportioned exactly to the income of each individual. Take the question of tea. Say there was a teetotal and poor family of five persons, who used half-a-pound a tea per week. Under the present rate that family paid 2d. per week to the revenue, or 1s. 8d. per year each person to the State. If the family were to pay anything at all, was it an unreasonable thing that they should pay 1s. 8d. each for the security, peace, and protection of the State, and all the advantages of belonging to a highly-civilised State? As long as they maintained a system of indirect taxation, which included alcohol and various adjustments in tea and tobacco, they could not do away with the anomalies which must exist under that system. No one would suggest that, for the sake of an absolutely theoretically perfect system of taxation, the duty on alcohol should be taken off, because the evil which would ensue from that would be greater than the evil which now existed. Supposing they could get over all the anomalies by doing away with indirect taxation, which produced something like £47,000,000 of their revenue, and could raise the whole by some more direct system, let them consider how the balance sheet would possibly be made out. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment suggested that other subjects should be taxed, instancing the two of man servants and persons who had large gardens. But, from many practical standpoints, such a proposition was, on the face of it, quite impossible. If only half a farthing per head per day was paid on an article consumed by the mass of the people, it would produce a revenue of £7,000,000 per annum. To place an exorbitant tax on men servants would have the effect of rendering the man servant a thing of the past; and the result of taxing large gardens would be that they would be broken up and built upon, creating greater evils to the community than that which they sought to cure. If they did away with indirect taxation, the only possible sources of income were the death duties or the income tax. Obviously they could not take a large sum from both these subjects, because if they enormously increased the death duties they would reduce the amount payable as income tax; and if they enormously increased the income tax, they must ultimately reduce the death duties. The whole corpus of the death duties was roughly about 165 millions a year, and it would take 30 per cent. of that amount to raise the sum now raised by indirect taxation. If they excluded the smaller estates, it would take 30 per cent. on all estates between £10,000 and £100,000; 50 per cent. between £100,000 and £1,000,000; and the whole of those over £1,000,000 to raise the amount now raised in a simple and easy way by the present system of indirect taxation. As regards the income tax, it would require to produce the amount now raised by indirect taxation a 3s. tax on incomes between £1,000 and £2,000; 4s. on incomes between £2,000 and £5,000; 6s. between £5,000 and £10,000, and 10s. over £10,000. There was a common idea that it was easy to raise an unlimited amount upon income tax and death duties, but if they attempted to enormously increase these sources of revenue, they would kill the goose that laid the golden eggs. It was impossible to adjust with strict theoretic accuracy the individual burden of taxation upon rich and poor so long as the indirect taxation on alcohol was maintained. The only plan of relieving the burden on the poorer classes was by making up to them in other ways. Education in all its branches had become an enormous means of readjusting taxation between rich and poor. The expenses of sanitation and the facilities for obtaining better dwellings were advantages enjoyed directly by the poor, and only indirectly by the rich. It was by these means, rather than through any attempt to make the system theoretically accurate, by removing indirect taxation, that justice would be done and benefit conferred all round.

Mr. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside) agreed that it was desirable to continue the taxation on alcohol, and said so long as that was done there must be some anomalies in our system of taxation. But the present seemed to him an opportune moment to relieve the taxation on the necessaries of life. [Cheers.] The present Amendment only proposed to reduce the tea duty from 4d. to 2d. He would like to see it abolished altogether. During the past two years, owing to the increase of the revenue, the incidence of taxation had rather proved that the indirect had increased at the expense of the direct taxation. Therefore, there had been really a reversal of the policy of successive Governments in the past. Another reason for the abolition of the tea duty was that the cost of collecting indirect taxation was greater than in the case of direct taxation. Some reference had been made to the substituting of other subjects of taxation. He believed there was no necessity for the Government relieving the landlords last year, or giving money to the Voluntary Schools this year in the way they had done. But apart from that, there were subjects which might receive the favourable consideration of the Government. Mining royalties and ground rents might very well be taxed, and would yield an enormous revenue. Then the Government might consider the question of how far it was practicable to prevent the evasions of the death duties which at the present time was going on in this country. It was well known that many rich men were making in their own lifetime bequests to their heirs, simply with a view to evading the death duties. It was most desirable that the Government should prevent the evasion of what was a proper contribution to the Imperial Exchequer. With regard to the tea duty, it had in recent times been levied not so much on China as on Indian tea. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them that 87 per cent. of the tea imported came from India. That being so they ought to urge the undesirability of taxing for the benefit of our own revenue an article produced by our fellow-subjects in India. A year or two ago we declined to allow the Indian Government to raise a revenue on cotton goods manufactured in this country, and equally we ought to hesitate before we taxed tea produced by our Indian fellow-subjects, especially at a time when India was passing through a very severe famine. The tax was oppressive on the poor of this country. The duty was not an ad valorem duty, the more expensive teas paying just as much as the cheaper qualities.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER observed that, as he had shown last year, the great bulk of the tea was of medium value. Only a very small proportion was of first-class value, and there was no doubt that poor people were more disposed to buy the dearer tea than the cheaper.

MR. J. A. PEASE urged that it was desirable to get rid of taxes upon the necessaries of life, and said that he should certainly vote for the Amendment.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) asserted that in proportion to the population more tea was consumed in Ireland than in England. It was remarkable how the use of tea had grown. In 1845 the consumption in the United Kingdom was only 85,000,000lb.; in 1895 it had gone up to 240,000,000lb. Ireland's consumption was 25,000,000lb., and the Exchequer was taking from Ireland at least £500,000 in duty, and he calculated that out of this sum £300,000 came out of the pockets of the poor. He trusted that the demand made by the Irish representatives would not be met by the usual reply, non possumus. The comments made last week by the organs of the Press—including the highest, The Times itself—ought to have convinced the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was not a wise policy always to refuse the demands of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman could well afford to grant this concession, as the estimated revenue for the current year would yield an ample margin. Tea was absolutely free from duty in some of the colonies. [MR. BARTLEY: "What is the retail price in those colonies?"] He did not admit that that affected the argument. Then in Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, and Newfoundland the tax on tea was only 3d. Surely the wealthy mother country could afford to follow the example of her colonies in this matter.

MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport) said that the hon. Member for East Donegal, who moved the Amendment, approached the question from the Irish standpoint, namely, that all taxes at the present juncture should be resisted, because Ireland was bearing an unfair share of the burden. With that view he, of course, sympathised, but the reason why he intervened in the debate was that he held a strong opinion that the tea duty ought to be totally abolished. He had had some considerable experience in the matter, and he knew that, every time the duty was reduced, an extraordinary amount of annoyance, trouble, and expense was entailed on those interested in the business; and, although he had pledged himself over and again to what was called the free breakfast table, he would sooner that the duty should remain at 4d. than it should be reduced. Still he would not pledge himself not to vote for the reduction, because from one point of view reduction was better than nothing at all, as it would confer a benefit on the consumer; but the reduction of the duty to 2d. would be of no advantage to the duty payer. He would still be a duty payer, whereas if the duty were abolished, he would get rid of all that trouble. But this Amendment gave him an opportunity of putting another point to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that was as to the justification of charging those who paid the duty ¼ per cent. in addition. That was an exaction which could not be justified, and it was only fair that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should give the duty payer a quittance of it. They were told that it was charged in order to defray the expenses of collection; but surely, with an imposition of as much as 4d. a lb., this additional charge should not be made. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer was going to concede the 2d. a lb. asked for he would beg and implore him to get rid of the duty altogether.

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said that he would also be glad to see the tax on tea abolished, but its reduction by twopence per pound would at least be a good beginning. It seemed to him that one aspect of the question had not been sufficiently emphasised by previous speakers, and that was the question of economy. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to take off a tax which would make a hole in the revenue to the extent of £2,000,000 he must, of course, make it up by putting on another tax, or by curtailing expenditure. Never before in the history of the country had so favourable an opportunity presented itself to a Chancellor of the Exchequer to lighten the burden of taxation as during this tide of prosperity in the past two years. The Exchequer had been overflowing with receipts, and the surpluses had been large and unexpected. Those surpluses would have enabled the right hon. Gentleman not only to waste money on the Army and the Navy, which appeared to be a mania at the present day, but also to take off taxes. The reduction in the tea duty would reduce the revenue by about two millions. But in the present year there had been a million squandered in a grant to Egypt, and now there was to be a squandering of £200,000 in fresh armaments for South Africa, an expenditure which would probably lead to the waste of many millions. There was a special reason why the Irish Members desired this reduction of the tea duty. The tax on tea took from the people of Ireland, because they were poor, about three times what would be a fair proportion for Ireland to pay on this or any other tax. In 1895 the tax on tea realised from England £2,850,000; from Ireland £524,000, and from Scotland £370,000. Thus Ireland paid about one-sixth of the amount paid by Great Britain in the tax on tea. According to the Report of the Financial Commission the highest proportion Ireland ought to pay in taxes was 1-20th, as compared with Great Britain. Ireland paid £363,000 more than her fair proportion at the lowest point fixed by the Financial Commission. If the tax on tea was repealed, and the deficiency made up by, say, an addition to the income tax, or the tax on ground rents, the injustice of the present financial system as it affected Ireland would be lessened to the extent of £363,000. This was a strong ground for causing the Irish Members to feel strongly on this matter. When they raised the question of taxes on drink, they were always met by the sneer that the Irish should drink less whisky; if they would drink less whisky they would pay less taxes. Well, that taunt would not apply on this occasion. Temperance advocates were all in favour of the consumption of tea. The poorer Irish people were all great tea drinkers. It was a remarkable thing to go into a country cottage and find better tea served up than they could get in a London hotel. He thought it showed the good taste of the Irish people. They could find no argument, no sneer, to use against the people because they were fond of tea, and they had no right to penalise the tea drinkers. The revision of this tax would be an act of justice not only to Ireland, but all over the country.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have no intention of going into the general question of direct as against indirect taxation. There are some hon. Members of this House who would desire to see no indirect taxation at all. I gather that that is the view of the hon. Member opposite, but it is not my view. I think we have been wise in reducing the proportion which indirect taxation bears to the whole of our revenue, and perhaps the process will be extended; but at the present moment I do not think that it would be wise to extend it. I do not think that it would be wise that, in place of the duty on tea, we should now put another penny on the income tax. I do not gather that anyone except the hon. Member opposite has suggested this, and, therefore, I do not think it necessary to trouble the Committee with an argument on such a proposal. But I should like to say a few words as to the amount of the burthen which the duty on tea inflicts on the poorer classes. The hon. Member for Devonport gave us an interesting speech, but I felt that his natural prejudices were struggling with his sense of public duty. [Laughter.] He said that he should prefer that the tea duty should be abolished, and objected to its being reduced. In that he was pleading for his own trade and not for the public advantage. ["Oh!" and laughter.] I think, on public grounds, the abolition of this duty would be a very doubtful policy. It must be remembered that the tea duty is the only way by which we make large numbers of the population contribute in any way to the Revenue, and I do not think that its remission would tend to that economy which the hon. Member for Mayo advocated in the speech he has just delivered. But does this tea duty press unduly on the people? There is no doubt that the price of tea has very largely diminished in recent years. I have figures here which show that, as compared with 20 years ago, the price of tea has largely decreased. I am speaking of the wholesale price rather than of the retail price; for there is no article which pays the country grocer so well as tea. It is an article out of which he makes his profits as largely and as certainly as the innkeeper makes his profits out of alcohol. That fact diminishes the comparative incidence of the tax upon the consumer, because the consumer, if he be a poor man in a country village, will probably pay something like 2s. per pound for the small quantities he buys; and therefore the duty is one thing to the wholesale dealer, but in proportion to the cost of the article a very much less thing to the consumer if he be a poor man. I have compared the decrease in the price of tea and sugar, and although undoubtedly there has been a greater decrease in the price of sugar since 1875, the duty having been abolished the year before, yet tea runs it hard. Then, has the duty stopped consumption? In 1875-76 the consumption of tea was 4·51 lb. per head of the population; in 1895-6 it was 5·77 lb., so that I do not think it can be said that the duty on tea has injuriously affected the price to the consumer, or has decreased the consumption. But I admit that it would give me great pleasure to reduce the duty on tea; and that for the reason which has been urged by hon. Members from Ireland—that tea is largely consumed in that country. But what am I asked to do? I am asked to deprive myself of half the duty on tea, amounting to nearly £1,900,000, in order to benefit Ireland to the extent of something like £250,000 or £260,000. That is rather like killing a sheep in order to get a mutton chop. [Laughter.]

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman is scarcely doing me justice. I declined to move anything which would not affect the poorer taxpayers in all parts of the kingdom.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Perfectly. I do not deny that, but he will not deny that three-fourths of his speech were concerned with the grievances of Ireland in the matter of taxation; he put it mainly as an Irish case. The fact is that if, when this matter has been fully inquired into, it is necessary to do something which will re-establish an equilibrium between Great Britain and Ireland in the sense hon. Members from Ireland desire, a very much larger adjustment of taxation in one way or another, either by some great change in our system of taxation, or by large grants for local purposes in Ireland, will be required than could possibly be effected by the change now proposed. I come to my real objection to the Motion. I cannot spare the money. [Cheers.] I have placed before the Committee the expenditure for which I have to provide. Parliament has sanctioned the expenditure. The House must provide for it. Parliament, I think, will sanction the expenditure upon the Navy which the hon. Member for East Mayo talks of as money squandered. Parliament, I think, will sanction the expenditure in strengthening the garrison in South Africa—["hear, hear!"]—which to my mind is a pledge for peace. [Cheers.] And Parliament, I think, will sanction the other demands which we have made upon the taxpayers, and which we believe are necessary for the advantage of the country. If the money is not to be found by the tea duty, where is it to come from? As has already been pointed out, to suggest that nearly two millions a year could be found by an additional duty upon man-servants or large gardens is simply absurd. Those are the two suggestions of the hon. Member for Donegal.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: No, Sir. I suggested that, without any addition whatever to taxation, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has an assured surplus which would still enable him to remit the tea duty.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I am discussing the matter on the supposition that my Estimates of Revenue are accurate. I have given those Estimates to the best of my ability, on the best possible advice, and it is impossible for me to present to the Committee anything more than that which I believe is likely to be realised. And when the hon. Member for Donegal quotes the Returns for April of our imports as a sufficient reason for saying that there will be a larger revenue from Customs and Excise in the year than I have ventured to anticipate, I can only say, with all deference to him—for I know the study which he gives to these subjects—that his statement shows he has not mastered the details of the matter at all. These Returns relate to only one month, to begin with. They relate, too, to all kinds of imports besides those which pay duty. I can assure the hon. Member that the duty paid on tea in April is less than the duty paid in the corresponding month of last year.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: If the right hon. Gentleman will be good enough to look at the figures he will see that they relate to the four months from January to April.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: But three of the four months have nothing to do with the matter. I am concerned with the year from the 31st of March onward, and it does not follow that, because the last quarter of the last financial year has been a profitable one, the coming year should be more prosperous. I have provided in my Estimates for a reasonable increase both of the Customs and Excise. I have very carefully gone into the details of that increase, and I should not have been justified in giving any higher figures. The only other suggestion that has been made, so far as I know, is that made by the hon. Member for Northumberland—namely, that I should in some way or other stop what he characterised as an evasion of the Death Duties. I take it he means that people are making gifts in their lives instead of leaving their property to their heirs. In my opinion that is a very proper practice—["hear, hear!"]—and certainly, as long as I am Chancellor of the Exchequer, I will do nothing that would be so tyrannical and so unjust as to interfere with the liberty of a healthy man to dispose of his property to whomsoever he will. [Cheers.] I have no suggestion before me which would in any way compensate for the source of revenue with which I am asked to dispense, being, as I have said, nearly £2,000,000 a year. Whatever the future may have in store, I can only say that for the present it is impossible for me to accede to the Motion that has been made, and, although hon. Members opposite may not approve of the expenditure which we have incurred, and therefore may not feel themselves bound to provide the resources to meet it, I think I may fairly appeal to the majority of the Committee, who do approve of that expenditure and who are, therefore, bound to provide the revenue to meet it, to support me in the course I have taken. [Cheers.]

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON said the Chancellor of the Exchequer had received the proposal in such a very amiable way that they might hope that, if the chances of fortune were with him and trade improved, he might be able to meet their views on a future occasion. He did not intend to go at length into the question of the merits of direct and indirect taxation, but he desired to say that he did not wish to see all indirect taxation abolished. He did not believe that any Member of the House desired that indirect taxation on intoxicating liquor, for instance, should be abolished or reduced, and he thought that while many Members might think that the duty on tobacco might with advantage be altered, no one desired that a less duty should be levied. But it was indirect taxation on articles of household consumption to which they attached considerable importance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said he did not see his way to reduce the duty on tea, though it was quite evident that during the present year the proposed remission would not amount to a loss to the revenue of more than a million and a-half sterling. The supporters of the present Motion felt that, as the right hon. Gentleman had now been in office two years and had had surpluses of £7,000,000 in the aggregate, it was his duty not to bungle away the money as he had done—["Oh, oh!"]—either in expenditure or in giving grants and doles to different interests, classes, and localities, but to reduce the tea duties, which would have done far more to conduce to the personal comfort and convenience of the masses of the people. He was glad the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted two things, which were very strong arguments in favour of the present proposal. The right hon. Gentleman said that the actual pressure on the consumers of tea at the present moment was not so great as it was some 10, 15 or 20 years ago, because the price of tea had considerably fallen; but, as his hon. Friend pointed out, the fact that the price had fallen had increased the weight of the tax.

*The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Not on the consumer.

Mr. BUXTON did not say on the consumer; but, after all, it came to the same thing. ["Oh!"] The Chancellor of the Exchequer had admitted that the consumption of tea had very largely and quickly increased since the last reduction in the duty; and that was one of the strongest arguments in favour of a further reduction. Another reason for urgency was that, while 20 years ago, the proportions of Chinese and

Colonial tea consumed in this country were 84 and 16 per cent. respectively, they were last year 16 and 84 per cent. respectively. That was a most satisfactory fact from the Imperial and commercial point of view. ["Hear, hear!"] The argument that the abolition of the Tea Duty would give a certain part of the population immunity from taxation was only true in one sense. Employment, rent, and wages were all affected by the fact that so many millions had to be raised from the community in taxation. Besides, the amount raised from the Tea duty was comparatively so small—amounting to about 2s. a year on the individual—that its abolition was hardly to be considered from that point of view. It might be said that we ought not to tamper with the basis of taxation; but with its enormous reserves this country would never depend nowadays on the Tea Duty in time of war. He hoped, from the tone of the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that next year or the year after he would see his way to continue this beneficent policy of reducing the indirect taxation. ["Hear, hear!"]

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said that he had advocated the reduction or abolition of the Tea Duty in the House and in the country, and he felt bound to support the Amendment. He was sure that any reduction in the Tea Duty would be very well received. As to recouping the loss to the Exchequer which would follow from the abolition of the Tea Duty, he had no sympathy with the proposal to increase the tax on manservants; for that would make employment harder to get, though, if the suggestion had been for a tax on the employment of foreigners and German waiters, there might have been something in it. Neither could he sympathise with the suggestion for an increased Income Tax, which was far higher now than it ought to be in time of peace. There was much in what had been said by the hon. Member for Poplar as to the increased consumption of colonial tea. When they found that the course of trade was tending so much in favour of articles produced in the British Empire as the tea trade was at the present time, they had this additional reason for the Chancellor of the Exchequer taking this matter into his most serious consideration. He had another reason for urging the reduction or the abolition of the duty, and that was that it was paid entirely by the consumer in this country, and did not in any degree benefit any producer in this country. If this tax were transferred from tea to articles which competed with British trade he thought it would be infinitely better for the whole of the community. Two per cent. on the importation of foreign manufactured goods would find the Chancellor of the Exchequer with the £2,000,000 he would require if this Resolution were accepted by the Committee. It might not be possible for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do so in the present year, but he did venture to assure him that what many supporters of the Unionist Party desired was a transference of this indirect taxation to taxes which would benefit the trade and labour of this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer would readily find a new source of revenue in the large and increasing importation of goods which competed with the trade and labour of this country, and he hoped that his right hon. Friend would at some future time be able to reduce, if not to abolish this duty upon an article produced largely within the British Empire, and one which was paid entirely by the consumer.

MR. J. W. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough) said he heartily supported the Amendment, and regretted that it had not received warmer and more strenuous support from the Front Opposition Bench. The Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested that, if the duty were removed, it would have the effect of taking off the shoulders of large portions of the community the only remaining contribution which they made towards the maintenance of the country. Who were those people? The very poorest of the poor—the people who could afford to drink nothing but tea. This duty was a heavy tax on the poorest people of the country. He could not for the life of him understand how well-to-do people could be comfortable while they knew that large portions of the population of this country had to pay what was a heavy impost upon their slender means. In a rich country like England they ought to take off the shoulders of people this miserable tax of 4d. a pound upon tea. On the other side of the House there were many Members who had been sent to the House by the agricultural labourers, and he sometimes asked himself what the agricultural labourers were thinking of when they voted for those hon. Gentlemen. But on behalf of those poor men who, to the eternal disgrace of England, only receive 9s. or 10s. a week wages, he claimed support for the Motion from their representatives on the other side of the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked how the loss to the revenue was to be made up if the duty on tea were repealed. For his part he would a thousand times rather have a penny in the pound added to the income tax than that poor old women and agricultural labourers should be taxed to the extent of 4d. in the lb. on tea. The Government had done a great deal for the wealthy people of the country. They had given two millions a year to the rich landlords, and £600,000 a year to the parsons. Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer now commemorate the 60th year of the glorious reign of Her Majesty by knocking off the tax on tea.

MR. LOUGH hoped that hon. Members opposite who represented the masses of the people in large centres of population would join in the excellent example set by the hon. Member for the Central Division of Sheffield—[Sir HOWARD VINCENT: "Hear, hear!" (Laughter.)]—in saying that he would vote for the Motion. He thought the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was extremely interesting. It was probably the best speech in support of the Irish case that had been delivered in the course of the Debate. He hoped the Irish Members would take to heart the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out that in order that Ireland might get £650,000 he was asked to give up two millions. The right hon. Gentleman had said in effect, "Don't be so solicitous about Great Britain; ask what you want for your own country." He would do it if his hon. Friends from Ireland did not, and he would move at a later stage that the tea tax should be taken off Ireland without being disturbed in Great Britain. The right hon. Gentleman said that no suggestion was made as to where the two millions might come from. Why should not a tax be put upon silk rather than on tea? In that way two millions might easily be obtained. There would be just as much free trade in the one tax as in the other. It was not true to say that if the tax on tea were taken off some people in this country would pay no tax at all. If the poor did not pay in tea they paid in depreciated wages and increase of rent. He pointed out that when a little tax of £50,000 was put on a trade, the trade was always glad to pay it; they were not taxing the trade, for they levied, not £50,000, but £200,000. [Cries of "Oh!"] The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the proportion of the duty to the price of tea was less now than formerly. He was entirely wrong about that. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] He knew something about it. It was no disadvantage in that House for a man to talk of what he understood. Those Members very often talked the most who knew the least. [Cheers.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the average price of tea was 2s. per lb. Throughout the country it did not exceed 1s. 6d. or 1s. 4d., as the retail price to the consumer. So if the duty was 4d. in the lb., that was no less than 25 per cent. on the retail price. The Chancellor of the Exchequer created a great deal of discontent in the trade by his statement of the high price at which tea was sold. But if they left out the expensive qualities, the average price of tea sold in England was 6½d. or 7d. in the public sales, and on this a duty of 4d. in the lb. was levied. He supported the Motion of the hon. Member for East Donegal.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR contended that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had in no way answered the case he put forward. His contention was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer could afford this remission of duty without disturbing any portion of his Budget. He said he had to meet certain expenditure which the House had sanctioned for the Navy, for war purposes, and other matters. But his own point was that, without disturbing any of this sanctioned expenditure, there were abundant funds at the disposal of the Treasury. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer reckoned for a balance of £433,000, and this year for a balance of £503,000. But instead of £433,000, he realised £2,442,000. There was every indication that this year they would have a repetition of the experience of last year, but on a larger scale. The right hon. Gentleman did not deal with this, nor did he explain why he anticipated that we had reached high-water mark. From the figures the right hon. Gentleman had given, he must anticipate that this year would be more prosperous than last year. If we were still on the rising tide, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had £2,442,000 where he expected £433,000, might it not be expected that he would receive £2,500,000 where he expected £503,000? He himself had taken the official figures from the 1st January, 1897, and had compared them with the figures of the first four months of 1896, and they showed conclusively that the progress and development and increased duty on articles was greater now than it was last year. The contention that he would have £2,500,000 surplus at the end of the financial year had not been touched by the right hon. Gentleman. If the unofficial Estimates proved to be true against the Treasury Estimates, would the Chancellor of the Exchequer next year, if he found he had £2,000,000 beyond what he estimated, agree to a reduction of 2d. in the lb. on the tea duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid I can make no promise with regard to next year's Budget.

Question put, "That the words 'four pence' stand part of the Question."

Main Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

"That the Duty of Customs now payable on Tea shall continue to be charged, levied, and paid on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say):—Tea the pound Four Pence."

Resolution to be reported To-morrow at Two of the clock; Committee report progress; to sit again upon Wednesday.

METROPOLITAN AND OTHER POLICE COURTS BILL.

Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [3rd May] further adjourned till To-morrow at Two of the clock.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS (HOLIDAYS) BILL.

On the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill,

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked for some explanation of the Measure.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool) said that he had explained the purpose of the Bill on a former occasion. At present, when a Bank Holiday was ordered, as on the occasion of the approaching Jubilee, the Secretary of State for the Home Department had no power to close the police courts. He thought it would be admitted that they ought to be closed, and the power which the Bill would confer of doing so by order was desirable, in order that commercial inconvenience might be obviated in connection with Bills of Exchange falling due on the day.

MR. D. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) asked what was to become of prisoners locked up before a Bank Holiday. Were they not to get a holiday as well as the Magistrates? [Laughter.]

Read a Second Time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £8,485, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses of the Offices of the House of Lords."

2. "That a sum, not exceeding £7,074, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the salaries and expenses of the Department of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council."

Resolutions agreed to.

VOLUNTEERS BILL.

Committee (Progress, 10th May).

Clause 1,—

EXPLANATION OF 26 AND 27 N.C. C. 65, SS. 24, 27.

For removing doubts, it is hereby declared that the power under section twenty-four of the Volunteer Act 1863, to make rules with respect to a Volunteer Corps shall extend, and be deemed to have always extended, to rules for securing the efficiency of the members of the corps, and that a fine for the breach of any rule made under that power shall not be deemed to be a civil debt.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) moved after the word "power" to insert the words "and approved by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department." He said that the Bill proposed to amend the Volunteers Act of 1863, under which the Courts had decided that if a Volunteer regiment made a rule and provided that for its violation a penalty should be incurred, that penalty was only a civil debt, which could not be enforced by imprisonment. The object of this Bill was to convert what at present was a matter of civil debt into a criminal offence, and the debt was in the last resort to be enforcible by imprisonment. The Act of 1863 provided by Section 24 that the rules which a corps made should be approved by the Secretary of State for War, but he held that the War Office was not the proper Department to have the power of revising and approving these rules. He was not speaking without book, because in the case of the Queen v. Lewis, decided by the Queen's Bench Division in May last year, the Court held that the rule which the Volunteer corps had made in that case was ultra vires. But the War Office had passed and approved the rule in that case, and, therefore, the check exercised by the War Office could not be regarded as any check at all. It was obvious that at the War Office they had not the machinery to check these rules, and, therefore, he proposed to substitute the Home Office for the War Office.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) said that when the purport of these rules was understood by the House, he thought hon. Members would be of opinion that the War Office was the proper authority. He contended that the hon. Member was taking advantage of a technical point to discuss matters which were not germane to the present Bill. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. PICKERSGILL said the hon. and learned Gentleman had made no reply to his arguments. A few weeks ago the Lord Chief Justice held that the corps in the case to which he had referred actually made a rule which it had no power to make. He cited that case to show that the check of the War Office was no safeguard at all, as was shown by their having sanctioned that rule. He moved the Amendment simply in order that these rules might be checked in the way which he thought the Legislature intended when the principal Act was passed.

And, it being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

On the Order for the Third Reading of this Bill,

Mr. CRILLY objected to the Bill being taken at that hour (Twelve o'clock).

Mr. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby) hoped that the hon. Member would not persist in his objection. There was no opposition to the Bill locally. It was of great importance locally, because the channel into the Mersey would be lighted by two different authorities unless the Bill became law.

Mr. CRILLY said he had received communications from Liverpool on the subject which induced him to oppose the Third Reading of the Measure.

QUARTER SESSIONS JURORS (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

SPECIFICATION OF DIVISIONS FOR THE PURPOSES OF THE ACT.

(1.) The Lord Lieutenant may, when it appears to him desirable for the relief of jurors from unnecessary attendance at Quarter Sessions, by Order in Council, declare the provisions of this Act to be in force in any specified Quarter Sessions division as from the date of the Order, and the provisions of this Act shall, after the said date, be in force in such division, and that division shall be a specified division within the meaning of this Act.

(2.) Any Order made under this section may be revoked by a subsequent Order made in the same manner.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PROVISION FOR LODGING NOTICE OF BILLS OF INDICTMENT AND CRIMINAL TRIALS.

Where it is intended to present a Bill of Indictment at a Court of Quarter Sessions in a specified division, or to proceed at such Court with the trial of any person on a Bill of Indictment previously found, the prescribed notice of such intention shall be lodged by or on behalf of the person having the conduct of the prosecution in the office of the Clerk of the Peace not later than three clear days (exclusive of a Sunday) previous to the day appointed for the trial of criminal causes before that Court.

JURORS TO BE RELIEVED FROM ATTENDANCE IN CERTAIN CASES.

(1.) Where in a specified division no such notice has been so lodged as aforesaid, the Clerk of the Peace shall forthwith report to the Sheriff to that effect, and the Sheriff shall thereupon notify in the prescribed manner all jurors summoned to attend the Court for the purpose of criminal business that their attendance will not be required.

(2.) Every person so summoned and subsequently notified under this section shall be given credit for an attendance as if he had attended in pursuance of the summons.

(3.) Where it is the duty of the Clerk of the Peace to summon jurors to attend at a Court of Quarter Sessions, the duties imposed by this section upon the Sheriff shall be discharged by the Clerk of the Peace, and it shall not be necessary to make a report to the Sheriff.

*LORD MORRIS said he had an Amendment to propose to the clause, with the object of providing for the expenses of the Sheriff in connection with the duties imposed upon him under the Bill. As the Bill stood, there was no provision; the matter was by the proposed Amendment left entirely in the discretion of the Grand Jury. It was necessary that some provision should be made in the Bill for the new duties cast upon the Sheriff. He moved accordingly, as a new Sub-section to Clause 3:—

(4.) The expenses of this Act, incurred in connection with the duties hereby imposed on Sheriffs and Clerks of the Peace, shall be defrayed out of the county cess, and it shall be lawful for the Grand Jury of every county, and for every Town Council empowered to make presentment, as the case may be, from time to time, at the next ensuing assizes or presenting term, and they are hereby required, without previous application at presentment sessions, or otherwise, to present all such sums of money as they may deem reasonable and necessary for defraying such expenses.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH said there was no objection to the Amendment of the noble and learned Lord except that it would be better, as a matter of drafting, that it should be moved as a new clause.

Amendment agreed to, and inserted as a new clause (Clause 4) after Clause 3.

*Lord MORRIS further moved, after the clause last inserted, to insert the following new clause:—

(5.) The Clerks of the Union shall, in compiling the lists of jurors each year for revision, set forth, as far as practicable, in a separate column on the said lists, after the name of each juror, the name of the post office nearest to his residence.

The noble Lord pointed out that the Sheriffs' list did not require that the post town of the juror should be given, and it was obvious that without such a provision as that embodied in this Amendment the letter might miscarry and not reach a juror at all, and it might be impossible for the Sheriff to carry out his duty completely.

The Earl of DENBIGH said the Amendment was somewhat out of order in connection with this particular Bill. It was really an Amendment to Section 9 of the Jurors (Ireland) Act, 1871, and, as such, it was outside the scope and not covered by the title of this Bill. It was the opinion of the Irish Office that it was not necessary to deal with the matter in a fresh Act of Parliament, but that it was competent to the Department to deal with it as an ordinary Instruction, if it were found necessary to do so, as a matter of general convenience to the Sheriffs of Ireland, and in consequence he regretted to say he could not accept the Amendment.

*Lord MORRIS asked leave to withdraw the Amendment, intimating that he should bring the subject up again when the Bill came before the Standing Committee.

Proposed new clause, by leave, withdrawn.

POWER TO ADJOURN TRIALS.

(1.) In the case of any person returned for trial, or whose trial has been adjourned to a Court of Quarter Sessions in a specified division where the jurors have been notified under this Act that their attendance will not be required, the Chairman or Recorder presiding over the Court shall adjourn the trial of such person to the next ensuing Court of Quarter Sessions for any division of the county in which the specified division is included, or to the next ensuing Court of Assize for such county, and any recognizance entered into in respect of such trial shall, without renewal, be valid and binding in respect of the adjourned trial.

(2.) Such Chairman or Recorder shall have, in addition to all powers already vested in him, power to admit such person to bail until the sitting of the Court to which his trial is adjourned.

The Earl of DENBIGH moved, in Sub-section (1), to leave out the word "shall"—["shall adjourn"]—and to insert the word "may." The object of the substitution was that the Chairman or recorder presiding over the Court might have full option of discharging the prisoner if there should be any sort of idea that there had been wilful delay for the purpose of annoying the individual in question.

Amendment agreed to; Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

RULES. 40 & 41 VICT. C. 56.

The power of making rules and orders conferred by section seventy-nine of the County Officers and Courts (Ireland) Act 1877, shall be exercised for the purpose of carrying this Act into effect.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 6,—

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Sir H. VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): To call attention to certain matters relating to the trade of the United Kingdom and the Colonies; and to move a Resolution.—[An early day.]

RAILWAY RATES (IRELAND.)

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): To call attention to the excessive railway rates in Ireland; and to move a Resolution.—[An early day.]

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICES (LEWIS).

Mr. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the small number of money order offices in the Island of Lewis, the population of which numbers nearly 30,000, he will again consider the advisability of opening money order offices at Barvas and Crossbost without guarantee?

The SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. R. W. Hanbury, Preston): The Postmaster General regrets that the circumstances of the case would not justify him in opening offices at the places in question without guarantee. There are already six in the so-called Island of Lewis, which is not an island, but only half a one.

Mr. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, in view of the fact that in reply to an inquiry for the names of the post offices in the Island of Lewis at which money order and savings bank business is transacted the Secretary on the 31st March issued the following list, viz. Callanish, Carloway, Harris, Miavaig, Ness, Obbe, Port of Ness, and Scalpay, whether he is aware that three of the eight places named are not situated in the island of Lewis at all, and that the list is otherwise inaccurate, the most important money order office in the island, viz. Stornoway, being omitted; and, whether, in the circumstances, he will now give an accurate list of the money order offices in the island?

Mr. HANBURY: It is regretted that in the letter mentioned by the hon. Member, the sub-post offices in both Harris and Lewis (which are divisions of the same island) were included instead of those in Lewis only. Stornoway was accidentally omitted and the list was in that respect inaccurate. The money order offices in Lewis are as follows:—Stornoway, Callanish, Carloway, Miaviag, Ness and Port of Ness.

UPPER DIVISION CLERKS (CHARITY COMMISSION).

Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury (1) whether the clerks of the Upper Division in the Office of the Charity Commission are required by Treasury Minute of 27th May 1883 to be either barristers or solicitors; (2) whether such clerks are appointed by open competition and after examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, or are nominated personally by the head of the Department without such examination; and, (3) if by the latter method, whether there is any reason why these clerks should not be appointed by open competition, as in the case of clerks of a similar class, required to possess legal qualifications, in the Office of the Ecclesiastical Commission and the Office of Woods?

MR. HANBURY: The answer to the first paragraph is Yes. The limits of age are 25 to 32, and the scale of salary £250, rising to £400. These clerks are nominated by the Charity Commissioners without a Civil Service examination, but they must either be barristers of not less than two years' standing who have been called to the Bar after passing a public examination, or else persons who have been duly admitted as solicitors under the regulations of November 2, 1875. The present system secures men possessing the special qualifications necessary for the work, and there seems no need to alter it. I am not aware of any similar officers at the Ecclesiastical Commission. At the Office of Woods the limits of age and the scale of salary are much lower and they are not required to be either barristers or solicitors.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (EXAMINERS).

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury (1) whether appointment to the class of examiners in the Education Department is made by open competition and after examination of candidates by the Civil Service Commissioners, or by the personal nomination of the head of the Department without such examination; and if by the latter method, whether there is any reason why the system of open competition could not be adopted with regard to these appointments; and (2) whether the official duties of the Examiners are generally analogous to those of Clerks of the Upper Division in other offices, and such as could properly be performed br Clerks of the Upper Division?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): The Examiners in the Education Department are appointed by the Lord President of the Council. The special qualifications needed for the office could not, in the opinion of the Committee of Council, be secured by open competition. The answer to the last paragraph is in the negative.

Captain Norton.

LAND COMMISSION.

MR. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Sub-Commissioners who sat at Carrickmacross on 18th March last, to fix fair rents on the estates of Mr. S. E. Shirley and Major Tennison respectively, have not viewed all the farms yet and in no case has judgment been given; whether he can say what is the cause of the delay in viewing the farms of tenants whose cases were heard at Carrickmacross on 18th March; and, when will judgment be given?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I am informed that the lay Assistant Commissioners have not yet completed the inspections in the cases recently heard at Carrickmacross, but that the work, which has been somewhat retarded by bad weather, is being proceeded with, with as much expedition as possible. The decisions will be announced as soon as all the inspections have been finished, but no date can yet be fixed.

MR. DALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that tenants on the estate of Mr. R. C. Leslie, Ballybay, who served notice before November last to have their fair rents fixed on their holdings, have not got their cases heard yet; whether he can state the cause of this delay; and, whether the Sub-Commissioners will sit at Ballybay to try the cases in question, and when?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: In all cases on this estate where originating notices were received prior to the 1st November last the applications have been listed for hearing and appear upon a list, the hearing of which was commenced at Castleblayney on the 29th April. There has been no delay in dealing with these applications. It is probable that the Chairman of the Sub-Commission will sit at Ballybay for the disposal of the cases referred to, but the place of hearing has not been finally arranged.

EVICTION (LITTLEDALE ESTATE, COUNTY WICKLOW).

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutentant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Receiver on the Littledale Estate, county Wicklow, has refused from James Byrne an offer of 20 years' purchase for the farm from which he had been evicted; and, if so, whether the Receiver consulted Mr. Justice Ross before refusing the evicted tenant's offer?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: So far as can be ascertained there are not any proceedings pending in the Land Judge's Court in reference to the estate mentioned in this Question.

CONGO STATE.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (1) whether the territory west of the 30th meridian E. of Greenwich leased by Her Majesty's late advisers to His Majesty Leopold II, Sovereign of the Congo State, continues to be so leased, or what is its international position, the corresponding lease by the Congo State to Great Britain named in Article III. of the Agreement having been cancelled by the withdrawal of Article III.; and (2) whether in the territory east of the 30th meridian E. of Greenwich leased at the same time by Her Majesty's Government to King Leopold, but not since renounced by the Congo State, the special flag named in the Agreement is used by the Congolese forces, and what is it?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The position created by the circumstances mentioned in the first paragraph of the right hon. Baronet's Question remains the same as it was under the late Government. The special flag to be used in the territory named in the second Article of the Agreement has not yet been defined.

EXPULSION OF MR. MACPHERSON FROM PARIS.

MR. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has received official information that Mr. Macpherson, a British subject for many years resident in Paris, has been expelled from France by order of the Minister of the Interior; whether the Government have any information to show that the ground of the "arrêté d'expulsion" was that Mr. Macpherson had been active in arranging a conference in connection with the International Federation of Dock Labourers; and whether the Secretary of State proposes to make inquiry into the matter?

MR. CURZON: Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris has reported the expulsion of Mr. Macpherson on the ground that his presence on French territory was of a nature to compromise public safety. Her Majesty's Ambassador has been instructed that if the action of the French Government was considered to be required in the interests of public order, and if it has been confined strictly to what was necessary to enforce the expulsion, they appear to be within their rights and the occasion for diplomatic action does not arise.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state the hours of arrival and dispatch of the mid-day letters in Cavan and Belturbet respectively; whether he is aware that, whilst the acceleration of the mails all over Ireland has meant a gain of an hour and a half at least to most Irish towns, it only means about half an hour in county Cavan: and, whether, without incurring the cost of an extra train, the Postmaster General could press the Great Northern Railway Company to start their train at 8.30 a.m. instead of 9 a.m. as at present?

MR. HANBURY: At Cavan the hour of the arrival of the mail is 11.5 a.m. and of departure 1.45 p.m. At Belturbet they are 11.35 a.m. and 1.45 p.m. The gain of time for reply at Cavan is 40 minutes, and Belturbet ten minutes. Even if the railway company would agree to start the train from Dundalk at 8.30 a.m. instead of at 9.0 a.m. a further difficulty lies in the fact that the train from Dundalk joines at Clones a train from Belfast which only reaches Clones at 10.21 and which the Company cannot see their way to run earlier. Unless, therefore, an additional train were run beyond Clones, the train from Dundalk must still wait for the Belfast train, and thus no benefit to Cavan and Belturbet or to Enniskillen would arise from an earlier start from Dundalk.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman put a further question to the railway company as to the reason why in Cavan they have 40 minutes longer and in Belturbet only 10 minutes?

MR. HANBURY: It depends entirely upon the running of the trains of the Great Northern Railway. They refuse to alter their trains for mail purposes, and the number of letters and postal matters carried is not sufficient to justify additional trains for the purpose.

MR. DALY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the manager of the Great Northern Railway laid the blame at the door of the Treasury for not running additional trains.

[No answer was given.]

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY (TULLYVIN, CO. CAVAN).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that faults have been found by the County Inspector with the performance of his duties by Sergeant Kelly, of Tullyvin, County Cavan, and that this man has not got on well with the inhabitants of the district under his charge, this sergeant will be transferred to another station?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: There is no foundation for the statements made in the Question. The County Inspector has not had occasion to find fault with Sergeant Kelly, who gives entire satisfaction in the performance of his duties. I have no reason to believe that he does not get on well with the people of the district. It is not proposed to transfer him to another station.

ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will inquire into the circumstances of the death at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir in 1882 of Trumpeter Fanning of the 18th Hussars, who was killed whilst engaged in saving his Commanding Officer under circumstances of great bravery; whether he is aware that the mother of this young man is residing at Longford in very distressed circumstances; and whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the War Office will make his mother a compassionate allowance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Question of the hon. Member probably refers to Trumpeter Fanning, of the 19th Hussars, who died of wounds received in the battle of El Teb in 1884. The Secretary of State has no funds from which to make a compassionate allowance to the mother of a soldier; but if she can prove that she was in any considerable degree dependent on her son the case might be one for consideration by the Commissioners of the Royal Patriotic Fund.

ALDERSHOT CAMP SEWAGE FARM.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Aldershot Camp Sewage Farm, although much improved in its general condition, is still unsatisfactory as regards the character of the effluent; and whether it is the intention of the authorities to expend the extra money necessary to render the present farm successful, or whether it is intended to remove the operations to another site at a greater distance from the camp?

MR. BRODRICK: This subject, which is a very difficult one, and has been discussed with reference to the treatment of the sewage of the town as well as of the camp, is still under consideration, and there are some points which are not yet cleared up; but the Secretary of State hopes to arrive at a decision very shortly.

BONA FIDE TRAVELLERS (BALLYBUNION, CO. KERRY).

MR. MICHAEL FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that Sergeant Donaldson, of Ballybunion, County Kerry, on Sunday, 18th April 1897, prevented bonâ fide travellers from getting refreshments on the licensed premises of Edward Enright, Ballybunion, although the people so prevented were travelling from Listowel, a distance of ten miles, and tried to exercise their legal right, but, owing to the orders of Sergeant Donaldson, were compelled to leave the licensed premises without getting the necessary refreshments; and whether, owing to the fact that a very large number of tourists and the general public travel by the Lartigue railway to this well known seaside place, some inquiry will be made into the action of Sergeant Donaldson?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: It appears that on the date mentioned two men, who were not tourists, but the guard and engine driver of one of the trains, entered the licensed premises referred to, and the Sergeant, having satisfied himself that they resided at Listowel, of which fact he was not previously aware, the men refreshed themselves without being in any way prevented. The publican in question was fined for a breach of the Sunday Closing Act in January last. The action of the Sergeant, under the circumstances, was right and proper, and does not call for further notice. There will be no improper interference with the privileges of bonâ fide travellers at Ballybunion.

PORT OF NESS HARBOUR (LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state whether a copy of the arbitrator's award in the case of the Port of Ness Harbour, Island of Lewis, has yet been received at the Scottish Office?

MR. H. T. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews Burghs): My right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate has asked me to state that the answer is in the affirmative.

MINES AND QUARRIES (STATISTICS).

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state when the summaries of statistics relating to mines and quarries for 1896 will be issued; whether he is aware that they were issued last year on 13th March; and if he is further aware that much of the value and interest attaching to them is lost by issuing them at so late a date after the period to which they relate?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The summaries ought to have been issued some days ago, but there has been delay on the part of the lithographers who are printing the plans. A promise, however, has been given that they will be issued this afternoon. The hon. Member is mistaken as to the date of issue last year; it was not March the 13th, but June the 24th, the delay being due to the difficulty of getting in the quarry returns which were appearing in the summaries for the first time. Every effort is made to issue the summaries at the earliest possible date, but some of the quarry returns are not due till the 1st March, and I do not think it would be possible to issue them much sooner.

ARDAGH BURIAL GROUND.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether it is true that the Local Government Board have, without previous inquiry, but solely on the letter of a local landlord to the Board of Guardians of Longford Union, closed the Ardagh Burial Ground by sealed order; (2) whether such action is in accordance with the law; and (3) was the sealed order brought before him for approval before being issued?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: In August 1892, the Guardians of the Longford Union, acting as the Burial Board, asked the Local Government Board to hold an Inquiry into the condition of the two burial grounds in Ardagh, and the Inquiry was held in December of the same year. With reference to the second paragraph, I have to state that the requirements of Section 163 of the Public Health Act were duly complied with in this case. The answer to the third paragraph is in the negative. It was not until the Board found that their continued efforts to induce the Guardians to take steps to provide a fresh burial ground were fruitless, that they made their closing order on the present occasion.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a communication from the Guardians stating that in their opinion there was abundant room in the churchyards had been received?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Yes; but an Inquiry was held by the Local Government Board, and I gather that in their judgment as to the fact there was no doubt whatever.

WAR RISKS (BRITISH SHIPS).

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, when he is considering any proposed scheme for the insurance of British ships and cargoes against war risks in time of war, he will consider the advisability of taxing British shipping for its own protection, and not throw the cost of insuring a special industry on the taxes of the general population?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think it would be premature to answer questions on this subject until the Government have come to some provisional conclusion, at all events as to the practicability of any scheme or as to the nature of the scheme that should be adopted; but I may point out that, if insurances of the kind referred to by the hon. Member were set on foot, it would not be in the interests of the shipowning community, but in those of the British consumers as a whole. It would be solely in the interests of the latter that public funds would be used.

MR. O'KELLY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that such protection would not be at all in the interests of Ireland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, Sir; I cannot agree to that proposition. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. WILLIAM ALLAN (Gateshead) asked whether any Government had ever insured vessels and cargoes in war time, and whether such insurances were not effected by private underwriting firms?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I am not aware that any scheme of national insurance has ever been adopted before. But I would remind the House that perhaps I have gone almost too far in answering hypothetical questions on a very incomplete subject of study. ["Hear, hear!"]

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can conveniently so arrange that the Revenue Departments Estimates may be taken at an early date, in order to afford an opportunity of discussing the Report of the Committee on Post Office Establishments?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I fully recognise the importance of the Vote to which the hon. Gentleman calls attention, and I will take care that when it comes on the Committee shall have a full opportunity of discussing it, but I cannot promise that it will be taken either next Friday or Friday week.

MR. DALY asked whether the Irish Estimates would be taken on Friday week.

MR. J. P. FARRELL said that before the right hon. Gentleman answered that Question he should like to ask him—whether in the event of the Irish Estimates not being concluded on Friday next the discussion would be continued on the following Friday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I will not venture to answer these Questions now, because I might give a pledge which might prove to be inconvenient to hon. Members generally. There is no difference between the House and the Government in reference to matters of this kind. Our sole desire is to meet the wishes of hon. Members. I shall communicate with the usual channels of these negotiations with a view to meet the views of hon. Members opposite and in other parts of the House.

CAPE GARRISON.

MR. J. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the attention of the Secretary of State has been directed to a speech delivered at Dorchester by General Nicholson on the 10th May when inspecting the Batteries of the Royal Artillery which have been ordered to South Africa, and to General Nicholson's exhortation to the soldiers not to think the Boers could shoot as well as was generally reported; and whether the Commander-in-Chief and the authorities at the War Office intend to take notice of observations calculated to embitter the feelings between the British troops and the soldiers of the South African Republic?

MR. BRODRICK: The Secretary of State's attention has been called to General Nicholson's address to his men by the Question of the hon. Member. The remarks attributed to General Nicholson do not appear to call for the intervention of the authorities at the War Office.

GREECE AND THE POWERS.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can give the House any information as to the state of negotiations between the Government of Greece and the Powers. Perhaps I may be pardoned for reminding the right hon. Gentleman of the fact that yesterday in answer to a similar question he appealed to me not to press it, on the ground that negotiations were pending—[The First Lord of the Treasury: "Hear, hear!"]—and that therefore it would not be desirable that he should give any information on the subject. But in another place, in answer to what was practically the same Question, a tolerably full answer was given by the Prime Minister, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will forgive me for submitting to him that such a method for dealing with a Question fairly put from this side of the House is not treating the House with that consideration to which it is entitled, above all from its Leader. [Cheers.]

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I think the incident to which the right hon. Gentleman refers is an indication of the inconvenience which arises from the double demand made upon us by hon. Gentlemen opposite. One demand is that we should give answers to Questions of which the very shortest notice has been sent to us, and the other demand is that the information given by Ministers in this House should be identical with the information given on the same day by a Minister in the other House. Let me tell the House what happened yesterday—and it is merely an illustration of what has happened two or three times before. At a quarter past three I received notice of the right hon. Gentleman's Question.

Mr. JOHN MORLEY: I gave it at two o'clock.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I was away at two o'clock; in fact, I was at luncheon. [Laughter.] I actually received the notice a little after three. I went straight to the Foreign Office. Lord Salisbury was not there, and his private secretary could not inform me where he was. I waited there until half-past three, when I had to come here to answer questions. I carefully considered all the information at the disposal of the Government, and I came to the conclusion that I should be running a risk of making unnecessary difficulties in the conduct of delicate negotiations if, while these negotiations were going on, I were, without consulting with the Foreign Minister, to give any information to this House. [Cheers.] The Foreign Minister, it turns out, as I have since heard, was at Buckingham Palace. He then came down to the House of Lords quite ignorant of the fact that I had received private notice of a question. He was asked a question, and, of course, with that liberty of action which only a Foreign Minister can have—the Minister, in other words, who has all the threads of negotiations in his hands, and who has interviews with foreign ambassadors which no other Minister but the Prime Minister or the Foreign Minister has—he very naturally gave all the information in his power. Then the right hon. Gentleman is indignant—no, I will not say indignant—but he makes, not unnaturally, the complaint that the same information is not given in both Houses at the same time. All I can say is, that if either Lord Salisbury or I had received private notice early enough that identical questions were going to be asked, precisely the same answer would have been given in both places. [Cheers.] It may perhaps be to the satisfaction of the right hon. Gentleman to know that if the House of Lords yesterday received information which was not vouchsafed to the House of Commons, I shall be able to-day to give this House information which I presume has not yet been given to the House of Lords. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] In answer to the Question he has put to me, I may inform him that the requisite instructions have been received this morning by all the representatives at Athens, and that mediation was offered by them and accepted by Greece. ["Hear, hear!"] I have no further information at present to give the House.

Mr. J. MORLEY: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that answer. I do not propose to take up a moment of the time of the House in entering into any controversy with him as to the earlier part of his answer. I was not indignant—[cheers]—because we on this side of the House are getting rather accustomed to this kind of treatment, therefore there was no surprise on our part. [Cheers.] I would only say this, that I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would have told the Prime Minister that a question was about to be asked, and that he did not feel himself in a position to answer it. Sill, I pass over that, and I hope that in the future the House of Commons will be as well treated as it has been to-day. [Cheers.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what will be the course of business this week and next, and when the South African Vote will be taken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: As to the South African Vote, we are entirely in the right hon. Gentleman's hands. If he will let me know what arrangement can be come to in the regrettable absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, I will endeavour to carry out his wishes. The first business on Thursday will be the Second Reading of the Prison Made Goods Bill, and the Second Order the Third Reading of the Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill. On Monday the first business will be the Second Reading of the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill.

MR. J. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has arrived at any decision as to the course of procedure with regard to the Poor Law Relief (Ireland) Bill, and the Agricultural and Industries (Ireland) Bill, the latter of which I understand is postponed indefinitely?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: These Bills are postponed until Monday. It is possible that on or before that day I may be able to answer the hon. Member's Question, and to make a statement upon the subject.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

METROPOLITAN AND OTHER POLICE COURTS BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [3rd May], "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

Question again proposed. Debate resumed.

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.), continuing his speech, which was interrupted by the operation of the 12 o'clock Rule on 3rd May, said he had had an opportunity since he last spoke of reading the speech of the Under Secretary for the Home Department in introducing the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the expenses entailed by the Bill would be about £6,400. But they ought to know the basis upon which this sum had been estimated, and the specific items of which it was composed. With regard to the salaries of the clerks in the police-courts, he found that the total amount was about £19,000 per annum. They ought to have been informed by what percentage it was intended to increase these salaries. He had been told, in answer to a question, that it was intended to increase the salary of the chief clerk by £100, and that of the second clerk by £50 ; but there was no information with regard to the increase in the salaries of the remainder of the clerks. With regard to the increase in the salary of the chief clerk he could not think that that estimate had been fairly made. It must be remembered that the chief clerks in the Metropolitan police-courts were gentlemen of very great and, in many cases, unique experience ; and he did not think that the maximum of £600 now proposed was adequate for such an office. Inevitably these clerks would compare their salaries with those received by clerks to Justices in the several Petty Sessional Divisions in the Metropolis, and they would find that their salaries were very much lower, and would bring pressure at the Home Office to increase the maximum very much beyond the limit now contemplated. As to the proposed increased borrowing powers, they had been informed that the money was to be spent in two directions—in enfranchising the leasehold tenures of the building and also on erecting further buildings. But surely they ought to have been informed what proportion of the money was to be spent in the one direction and what in the other. Although that information had not been given, they knew that a very large expenditure on bricks and mortar was contemplated. The House was left in the dark so far as specific information was concerned, but they knew that the Bill proposed to remove two statutory bars now existing upon expenditure. With regard to the promise that £7,000 should be paid annually by the Treasury in respect of services rendered by the police to the Houses of Parliament, he thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for recognising that there should be an authoritative record of this engagement. It appeared to him, however, that that record should be made before and not after the Bill passed. There was one further item which ought to be included in the record. He referred to the expenditure upon the Extradition Court at Bow Street. That court was not a Metropolitan but a National institution, and clearly the Exchequer and not the ratepayers should pay for it. He understood the justice of this claim was admitted, but they ought to know in black and white what contribution was to be made by the Treasury in respect of the expenses of that court. He appealed to the Members for Richmond, Croydon, West Ham and other parts of the home counties which were included within the Metropolitan police district, to join in opposing the Bill. These districts would have to meet a double expense, first for their own Petty Sessional Courts, and, secondly, the cost of the Metropolitan police-courts, in which they had no interest as ratepayers. He could not understand what reasons could be alleged for precipitate haste in passing this Bill. The circumstances were different from what they were when the late Government brought forward a similar Bill. This question, with others, had since been referred to a Commission, and it seemed scarcely respectful to the Royal Commission for the House to forestall its decision by transferring these charges from the Treasury to the Metropolitan ratepayers. It might be said that it was absolutely necessary that the salaries of the clerks should be raised, and that new buildings should be erected. Well, if the Government would limit the Bill to these two purposes, without altering the present incidence, he, for one, would not oppose it. But in its present shape, he must offer it the most determined opposition. He moved to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

*Mr. CHARLES HARRISON (Plymouth) seconded the Amendment. He said the first proposal of the Bill was to transfer the staff of the London police-courts, other than magistrates, from the Consolidated Fund to the Metropolitan Police Fund.

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for the HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. Jesse Collings, Birmingham, Bordesley) said that the hon. Member was under a misapprehension. The Bill transferred nothing from the Consolidated Fund to the Police Fund. It did not interfere with any payment made out of the Consolidated Fund.

*Mr. HARRISON observed that that might be the intention of the right hon. Gentleman, but the language of the Bill would not carry it out. At all events, the cost of the police-courts staff, chief clerks and others, and their superannuation would, by the Bill, be thrown on the Metropolitan Local Police Fund, and the general taxpayer would be relieved. The second object of the Bill was to transfer the police-court buildings and their maintenance, now supported by funds voted by Parliament, from the Office of Works to the Receiver General, which would throw the expenses of these courts upon the Metropolis Police Fund. The only argument which had been urged in support of that proposal was that the Metropolitan police area was really the Municipal area for the Metropolis. But it was no such thing; it was an Imperial area, and the richest part of it, the City of London, with its 4½ millions of rateable property, contributed nothing towards the Metropolitan police. While the richest part of the Metropolis was taken out of the police area, a large area outside, extending some 15 or 20 miles round about London, was included in it. This extension was made because it was from the first intended to form an Imperial area for rating and policing. It included four corporations or towns, the whole of Middlesex, and parts of four other counties, or 668 square miles in all. There seemed to him to be no reason why any portion of this Imperial expenditure, whether for the police-court staffs or for buildings, should be thrown upon the Metropolitan ratepayers. So Imperial was the police force that its duties were not confined to the area which he had described. It was an area of criminal assize for a vast population beyond that of the mere Metropolis, and its police were employed at Her Majesty's dockyards at Devonport, Plymouth, Sheerness, and other places. The force was also employed at Imperial functions, and to protect the House of Commons. That being the state of the case, why should the buildings required for carrying on what was Imperial administration be thrown upon the local fund instead of being defrayed out of sums voted by Parliament? There was no intention to make any change in regard to the payment of the Metropolitan police magistrates, who would still be paid out of funds voted by Parliament. Why then should the staff of clerks be treated separately, and why should the cost of the buildings and the expenses be thrown upon the Police Fund, which is contributed by ratepayers? In 1839, when the Receiver was appointed, the ratepayers had to provide the court buildings, but as they came to be used more and more for Imperial purposes an Act was passed in 1871 transferring them from the Receiver General of Police and from local rate to funds contributed by the Imperial taxpayer. This Bill proposed to undo the arrangements made in 1871, and to throw the cost of the courts back again upon local funds. It was suggested that the Government would take care that no expense should be thrown upon the ratepayers, but would they assent to a provision to secure the ratepayers against extra burdens? When the force was first established in 1829 it was to be supported by a rate not exceeding 8d. in the pound. In 1868 the sum was increased to 9d., the Government contributing 4d. Upon the faith of the understanding as to the rate, leases had been granted and liabilities assumed; but if the proposal of the Government were carried the effect would be to enlarge the expenses, to alter the conditions of contracts, and to do away with the conditions which limited the ratepayers' liability to a rate not exceeding 9d. in the pound. In 1861 and in 1890, there being till then no power to provide pensions, Parliament imposed an additional liability on the locality, and something like £255,000 per annum was now paid for pensions which had been removed from the control of Parliament. The pensions were not subject to any control either by the ratepayers or by Parliament. The matter was in the hands of the Home Secretary and the Receiver General. A subordinate Imperial officer, uncontrolled by Parliament, spent about £1,447,000 per annum. In this case representation and taxation were absolutely divorced. No control was exercised over the Fund, and what had been the result? Why, the Receiver General had always levied up to the full amount of the 9d. rate, and the levy had been far in excess of the expenditure. The excess during the past 20 years had amounted to £245,000. It was suggested that it had been necessary to raise this extra amount to provide a working balance for the fund, but if the fund contributed by ratepayers were worked as other and with other funds, similarly administered, there was no necessity why one set of ratepayers of years past should provide this large sum. If the Police Fund were under the control of the ratepayers there would not be that excess. The Receiver General was an official over whom neither that House nor the ratepayers had any control, and the result was that his administration had been extravagant. The present Bill would lead to further uncontrolled extravagance. The cost of the police was 4s. 7·36d. per inhabitant, or on rateable value 8·33d. In Birmingham the cost was only 2s. 7d. per inhabitant, or 6·76d. on rateable value. He maintained that if any transfer of business were to be effected it ought not to be effected as proposed by this Bill. He urged that the expenses of the police-courts ought not to be thrown on local funds, that the Act of 1871, under which the buildings were transferred to the Commissioners of Works, ought not to be repealed, and that the staffs, as well as the magistrates, ought to be paid out of Imperial funds. There was no justification for burdening the ratepayers in what was really an Imperial area with the whole cost of the administration of public justice.

Mr. JAMES STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said that this Bill was of great concern to the Metropolis, not only within the four walls of the Bill itself, but also because it was part of a large and general question. He did not refer to the question of the control of the police, though he thought that might fairly be raised. But he wished to look on this Bill from a financial point of view. London had a considerable number of items on both sides of the account with the Treasury. On the one side were the contributions to London in aid of the rates, which were derived through various channels, and on the other side there were the expenses which London had to incur, a considerable portion of which were undoubtedly incurred for Imperial purposes. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill admitted that there were several charges falling upon London, which he reckoned at £7,000 a year, which would not fall on London but for her Imperial situation. He did not admit that the right hon. Gentleman had any right to take a particular item in police expenditure and set it against what was proposed to be put on London by this Bill. He did not think it was a reasonable or proper way of proceeding to isolate individual items on the one side or the other of the account, and say these ought to be borne by London. He contended that if the present situation in London were to be altered by this Bill, it ought to be shown that the contribution in aid of local rates in London was too large by the amount with which the Bill dealt.

What, then, was the situation in London? The main grievance lay in a most important point. The amount of the licence duties contributed under the Act of 1888, which is given back to London, was only 13 per cent. of the whole, the remaining 87 per cent. going to the rest of the country. If London's share were calculated by population, a much larger proportion than that would be due, and if it went by rateable value, then the rateable value of London was one-fifth of the whole rateable value of the country, which would make her share 20 per cent. As a matter of fact London received 21 per cent. of the grant from the probate duties. That being the recognised proportion, the amount received from the licence duties put London at a very great disadvantage indeed—a disadvantage of between £200,000 and £300,000 a year. That grievance had been more or less recognised by the occupants of the Front Bench on both sides of the House. He passed from that point to other and larger grievances in connection with contributions to local rates. Recent legislation had put London at a greater disadvantage still. There was the Agricultural Rating Act. What were the contributions that individuals living in London had to make to that. Quite apart from the question whether it was a good or a bad Act, it placed London at a great disadvantage so far as contributions to local purposes were concerned. Then there was the Voluntary Schools Bill. The effect of that Bill would be again to put London at a very serious disadvantage, and the method in which the Government had chosen to deal with School Boards, the balance between London and the rest of the country had been still more altered. Having treated London in that way the Government now came forward with their Bill to deprive London of another advantage. On the other hand, what was it proposed to do for London? It was proposed to give London a sum of £7,000 a year, whereas the Bill made it absolutely incumbent on London to pay the expenses to which it referred. He did not admit that £7,000 was anything like enough, and it would depend upon the Vote of the House of Commons and would be uncertain. The right hon. Gentleman dwelt on the anomaly of London police courts being held on leasehold terms; one of the objects of the Bill was to secure the purchase of the freehold, and a large sum of money would undoubtedly have to be spent for that purpose. Well, they were going to throw all this expense upon them and that was most inadequately met by £7,000 a year. The Bill came to a large sum indeed—he believed 10 or 12 thousand a year—and that would not cover it. They proposed to give them £7,000 for the service rendered by the police. Why was it not given long before now? They were paying for the services of the police in that House and elsewhere, and that Bill did not give them in the least adequate return. In other words, they would be losers without gaining anything in return. This Bill, in fact, created an additional charge on London rates. Formerly the expenditure on the police was limited to a 9d. rate, the Government paying in proportion. He thought that the House ought to know how this 9d. rate stood. He showed from figures which he quoted that the expenditure on the police was rising higher in proportion than the property that they had to protect. Then there was another point, and that was the confusion of areas that the present system brought about. The hon. Member seemed to think that this Bill affected only the Metropolis, but that was a mistake, and a new grievance was about to be started between London and the outside authorities. Some rearrangement would be unavoidable. These questions were always coming up in connection with London finance, and he was afraid that they were making confusion worse confounded.

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) thought there was a good deal of truth in what was said by the hon. Member. London was willing to pay its charges in connection with the police courts as in all other matters. ["Hear, hear!"] There might be a question raised as to Bow Street, which was, however, a separate matter. He supported the Bill on the understanding that it was to be the beginning of the readjusting of affairs as to London, which he regarded as unfairly treated in comparison with other parts of the country. London was receiving less than other parts of what was going. He referred to the Beer Bill and the Voluntary Schools Bill as examples to show that London was getting less than it ought. No doubt these were matters which might be laughed at, but they were very serious for London itself. ["Hear, hear!"] If London were not so uniformly of one colour—if it were partly Radical and partly Irish Nationalist—it might receive closer attention from the Government. He supported this Bill, but he hoped that the Metropolis would receive the same treatment as other parts of the country. In parts London was rich, but they were bound to point out that there were poor parts of London for which they ought to claim the full share of these grants.

MR. J. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid) said he opposed a Bill similar to this, which was introduced by the Liberal Government, and he must oppose this Measure. He admitted that the London people had a certain grievance so far as the probate and the licence duties were concerned. Every other portion of the United Kingdom got its fair share of the probate and the licence duties, and he never could understand how it was that London did not. Doubtless the amount of which London was deprived in respect to those duties was considerably larger than any sum it could possibly get under this Bill. It was also true that London had a grievance in regard to agricultural rating, Voluntary Schools, and Board Schools; but then against whom had it that grievance? Against the other portions of England only, because whatever London was deprived of in respect of those matters by the action of Parliament, went to the rest of England. As between London and Scotland and Ireland there was no grievance. There was no international grievance because Scotland and Ireland got their proportion whether London got its proper proportion or not. In what respect, then, had the people of Scotland and Ireland a grievance as regarded this Bill? The Bill professed to do away with the objection taken on the Estimates that the expenses of the metropolitan police courts were defrayed out of Imperial funds, whereas those of the police courts in every provincial town were paid out of local funds. The contention of the objectors was admitted to be sound, but how did the Government suggest it should be met? It was proposed that the buildings, for instance, should be handed over to the London authorities. Why should the buildings be so dealt with? In Scotland and Ireland the expenses attending such buildings were borne by the local rates. Upon what principle, therefore, if effect were to be given to the just contention he had previously mentioned, should the buildings in London be handed over as a present to the London authorities? Again, it was proposed that the salaries of the magistrates, amounting to £37,700, should be borne by the Consolidated Fund as at present. In the provinces of England, and other parts of the United Kingdom, the salaries of the magistrates were paid out of the local rates. Furthermore, the pensions of the magistrates were to be borne by Imperial funds, and they amounted to upwards of £7,000. In all about £45,000 was to be charged to the Consolidated Fund, with the result that these subjects would be withdrawn from the criticism of the House. He would like to know what was the interpretation put on Section 9 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839? That section provided that an annual sum not exceeding £50,000 was to be paid out of the Imperial funds for the purpose of the police courts. That section was to remain in force, and therefore a sum up to £50,000 might be paid. The fees were not to be paid into the Imperial Treasury, but were to be given to the police courts. Was it meant that, in addition to the £45,000 for salaries and pensions, about £50,000 was to be given annually, and no new provision made as to fees? Another objection to the Measure was that in reality it was a pension Bill. There was no provision in the appointment of clerks and other officials as to pensions, but the Bill entitled the present holders of offices to pensions. There was something to be said in favour of giving pensions to those appointed in the future, but it was hardly proper to spring this proposal as to present office holders upon the House. He mentioned that the Bill in no sense provided that equality of treatment which was said to be the reason for its introduction. There was to be a transaction between the Treasury on the one hand and London on the other, and in the end the Imperial taxpayer would be in a much worse position than he was in at present.

Mr. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.) wished to refer to the position which the extra-metropolitan areas would occupy under this Bill. As far as he understood, there were districts in Essex, Surrey, and parts of Middlesex which maintained their own police-courts at the present day, but which, under this Bill, would also contribute to the cost of the London courts. He knew there was some considerable misapprehension in these extra-metropolitan districts as to the effect of this Measure, and he thought they ought to have that difficulty cleared away before they were called upon to vote for the Second Reading. It appeared to him that the districts which were already discharging their own local affairs satisfactorily should not be called upon, under such a system as this, to contribute to other districts in which they had no particular concern.

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) thought it would be well if the Government would accept the wise advice of the hon. Member for Mid Lanark that it would be better to leave things as they are. The two questions which had come out in that Debate were those of control and of money. With regard to this question of control, if this Bill passed they would create a scandal of no slight magnitude. He quite admitted that theoretically the police-courts should be given over to the control of the local authority, but in London, unlike other towns, they had no properly constituted local authority, and, therefore, it was proposed to give the courts over to the control of a mysterious functionary called the Receiver of the Metropolitan Police. He did not think anybody knew exactly who he was, but the effect of this Bill would be that he would be empowered to do anything he pleased with public money. Practically speaking, he would be responsible to no man. He agreed the present position was anomalous, but it had this advantage, that when they discussed the Estimates these courts came before them, and they could criticise any extravagance in salaries, any extravagance connected with the buildings, or any scandal that arose in connection with the courts. That control would disappear if the courts passed into the hands of the Receiver, and, therefore, on that ground, he hoped the House would refuse to pass the Bill. He would deal for one moment with the question of money. The hon. Member for West Ham had had suggested to him the little trouble the outside areas would get into, financially, if the Bill were passed, and he had asked what was the cost that would be thrown on those areas. The right hon. Gentleman answered that question when he was explaining the Bill the other night. He said a charge would be thrown upon them, but it was a very small one. He would ask the hon. Member for West Ham not to rely on that. Whenever these bad principles were introduced into finance, they were always asked to assent because it was such a little thing. He commended to his hon. Friend the suggestion he had received from his own conscience to oppose the Bill, because it was not satisfactory that any charge should be thrown on these outside areas for this purpose. The right hon. Gentleman said, that if the £7,000 were not sufficient, the Treasury would make some addition to it. That was one of those slippery remarks—

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS did not think the hon. Gentleman could find that in his speech. What he stated was that the Treasury would give £7,000 for an ordinary Session, but that if there was an autumn Session or a long Session that amount would be increased.

Mr. LOUGH said that was his point—that if there was any loss, and representations were made to the Treasury, they would probably increase the amount. This was another suggestion to get the Bill through. He protested against their going on in a matter of this kind, in which there was no necessity to do anything under all these disadvantageous circumstances. The hon. Member for North Islington said he should vote for the Bill in the hope that this was the beginning of a general readjustment. This was a readjustment of £10,000 or £20,000 against London, and they should have no more of these financial scandals against the Metropolis attempted until, as the hon. Member for North Islington said, the whole matter was treated in a broad, liberal, and proper spirit. Because the finance of the Bill was bad, and because there would really be no control over these courts if the Bill passed, he hoped the House would agree to reject it.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS said that during the Debate many very important questions had been raised, but they had nothing to do with the Bill. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] The Bill did not raise them in any form, and he hoped hon. Gentlemen would not think him discourteous if he did not go outside its scope. It was a very simple Measure. At the present time, he thought all hon. Members would admit, the management of the courts and of the stations was simply a mass of confusion, and when business matters were managed in a confused, mixed, and unsatisfactory way there was always a loss. They had at this moment police-courts belonging to the Office of Works where the freehold was vested in the Receiver. There were other cases where the police-courts and the police-stations were one and the same building, half of which belonged to the Office of Works and for half of which the Receiver was responsible, and there was the case of a site part of which was leasehold and part belonged to the Receiver. He was sure that no business man would in his own affairs tolerate for a moment the existence of the state of things resulting from such divided control. The hon. Member for Bethnal Green made some extravagant references to what this Bill was going to do with regard to salaries. It was simply a matter of removing the limit placed on the clerks' salaries by an Act nearly 60 years old. The salaries were very small, but a Departmental Committee of the Treasury had reported in favour of their increase. The Treasury resolved to increase them, but found themselves barred by this old Act. The scale of increase was very limited, and the amount involved would not in the first instance be more than £270, and would ultimately be about £1,000. On the other hand, the sums received by police-court clerks for furnishing copies of depositions, amounting to £700 a year, would in future be paid into the Police Fund. With regard to the outside areas, even supposing nothing was paid by the Treasury, the burden thrown on the whole of Essex would be £194 on an assessable value of over one million sterling. In the case of Surrey the amount would be £271, or 1-25th of a penny in the pound. The total amount which would come out of the Metropolitan Police Fund under the Bill was £5,749, and against that there was paid into the fund £7,000 in respect of the services rendered by the police to the Houses of Parliament, besides a debt of £7,000 cancelled by the Treasury, and the buildings would be handed over to the fund. The expenditure of the money would be just as much within the purview of Parliament through the Home Secretary and the Receiver as it was now. With regard to the Extradition Court, his own opinion was that the demand that some consideration should be paid into the Police Fund in respect of it was a just one. He would communicate with the Treasury, and he was inclined to think that the Treasury would view the request with favour. Looking at the matter as a whole, he was disposed to think the advantage was with the Police Fund and the ratepayers, and that the Treasury had not made quite as good a bargain as they might have made. He desired to give a word of warning to the outside districts. The alternative was to make a separate rating area, and that was always objectionable, or to keep that a separate account with regard to the London police-courts, which would involve an enormous amount of labour and expense. This expense would fall on the Police Fund, and the outside areas would have to bear their share, while the £7,000 in respect of the police at the Houses of Parliament would be paid in for the advantage of the county of London only. The Bill would put the administration of the police-courts on a businesslike footing, and instead of throwing any extra burden on the ratepayers, would benefit the Police Fund to the extent of £1,500.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar) said, with the exception of the argument that from the business point of view this reform should take place, the right hon. Gentleman had given no reason why it should take place at the present moment. The present arrangement had in practice worked fairly well, and there was certainly no immediate hurry in regard to the transfer. He objected to a question of this character being dealt with in piecemeal fashion. At present the House of Commons had the opportunity of exercising some control over the expenditure of this police fund, but if they agreed to the proposals of the Government they would part with their control over this very large sum, which came partly from Imperial sources and partly from local rates. He did not wish to cast any imputation on the Home Secretary or the Receiver General, but he was certainly of opinion that they ought to retain the power to move reductions of the salaries of the officials who administered the police fund. If the Government thought that these expenses ought to be defrayed municipally, why did they not grant London municipal control over the police? As long as the Government chose to exercise Imperial control over the police, no additional burdens in respect of that force ought to be placed on the shoulders of the ratepayers. Regarded both from the point of view of the ratepayers' control over the police, and from the point of view of Parliamentary control over the Estimates, this Bill was a retrograde Measure. The right hon. Gentleman had dealt with the question whether this Measure would or would not throw some additional burdens on the police fund, and had said that in his opinion the £7,000 which he proposed to supply would make up for any additional charge on the fund. But there were Estimates worked out by the statistical officer of the London County Council, and his calculation, founded on the proposed increase of salaries, and on the large increase of expenditure that would be incurred by the acquisition of the freeholds of the police courts, was that there would be an additional charge of over £9,000. There were under the existing law statutory limits to the officials' salaries, and to the capital expenditure upon buildings, but the right hon. Gentleman proposed to get rid of these limits, and the past administration of the police fund did not encourage Members to think that when these limits were abolished there would be much economy.

*MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam) asked why the hon. Member did not pass equally severe criticisms on the Bill brought in by the right hon. Member for East Fife in 1894 or 1895? [Mr. BUXTON: "I am now in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility."] The reasons why it was not proposed by Her Majesty's Government to transfer the police courts to the London County Council were the same good reasons as influenced the right hon. Member for East Fife not to make that transfer. The statutory limits which had been referred to as removed by this Bill he regarded as public mischiefs. The limits on the salaries of the clerks led to their leaving London and taking service under provincial authorities, who paid them better. That showed that the market rate of payment was not being paid in London. Then the statutory limit upon capital expenditure upon buildings resulted in an unwillingness to spend sufficient public money for the purpose of having suitable buildings. There was no foundation for the fear that the House would be deprived of the control which it had hitherto exercised. But the kind of control which prevailed now was almost as great a public mischief as the statutory limitations. That control amounted practically to opposition to every kind of expenditure, and the Home Office had the greatest difficulty in inducing the officials of the Treasury, who feared what might be said in Parliament, to consent to any expenditure on the service of these police courts. The Treasury believed that the House had a radical objection to spending public money on local objects, and the result was that the police courts were not as efficiently provided for as they would be if this Bill were passed. The area affected by the Bill returned 88 Members to that House. Were they incapable of moving reductions on the Vote for the Receiver's salary? Then the accounts for the Metropolitan police were presented to Parliament annually in detail, and afforded the amplest opportunity for criticism. They knew from sad experience in the past that the voices of 88 Members were quite sufficiently powerful to influence the conduct of Ministers, and there was the indisputable fact that Debates and Questions asked in that House attracted a good deal more attention among Londoners than would be attracted by any number of debates on the same subject in any County Council that could be created. In the proposals of the Government he saw a very practical, if not a theoretically perfect, solution of a difficulty which ought to be dealt with in the interests of the public.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."—The House divided:—Ayes, 235; Noes, 87.—(Division List, No. 201.)

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read a Second time, and committed to the Standing Committee on Law, Etc.

POST OFFICE CONSOLIDATION BILL [H.L.].

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words, "upon this day six months." He said that the Bill was one of those which rose like spirits from the vasty deep, and required explanation. He should certainly show the House that this particular Bill required some explanation. In some cases, no doubt, as, for instance, in the case of enactments referring to friendly societies, it was necessary for them to be consolidated, for the assistance of the public; but it was not so important in Acts of this sort, because legal experts only were concerned with them. The so-called Consolidation Bills were commonly not Consolidation Bills at all. They arose in this way. A Department, when they had to carry into effect the wisdom of Parliament, embodied in a series of Acts, were confronted every day by new and sometimes great difficulties which they accumulated and presented to Parliament for removal. Then came what was called a Consolidation Bill, and such was the ingenuity in Government Departments that they could persuade even his hon. Friend the Solicitor General that a change in the law was not a change in the law. Consequently, Consolidation Bills sometimes embodied changes in the law, not on the merits, but simply for the convenience of a Department.

> "The merchant to secure his treasure
> Conveys it in a borrowed name.
> Euphelia serves to grace my measure,
> But Chloe is my real flame."

This Bill did alter the law. No Minister was responsible for the Bill, and that was why the universal weightbearer, the Secretary to the Treasury, had to move the Second Reading, instead of some high legal authority. The Bill was introduced last year, and in speaking of it in the House of Lords on July 30th 1896, the Lord Chancellor said:—

> "Some years ago it was the practice to pass these Bills through the House of Commons with the simple statement that they were Consolidation Bills."

If the Lord Chancellor meant that these Bills had been exempt from the ordinary procedure of the House, he was entirely wrong. The Lord Chancellor continued:

> "The Committee examined, word by word and line by line, everything that had been done in the way of alteration. . . . It would not be possible to get Members of the House of Commons or of their Lordships' House, to go through this laborious and careful work, if it was afterwards to be cast aside at the instance of any one Member who thought he would take an opportunity to amend the law where he thought it defective. If that system were pursued, it would be absolutely impossible to pursue this most useful work. . . Whether any other system of doing this work could be contrived, or whether the Gentleman (who was not one of the six Members who gave their assistance) could do it better or not, the whole system must break down if Amendments were to be made on Bills of this kind, and it was hopeless to attempt anything like consolidation. This Bill of 93 clauses was not to become law because of this objection. It only showed what mischief might be done. If the practice were not suppressed by the action of the House, and in another place, he, for one, would hesitate to ask his noble Friends to waste their time on work which might be perfectly useless. . . . The House of Commons should take means to prevent so gross an abuse."

It would be false modesty to affect not to know that the "any one Member" referred to by the Lord Chancellor was himself. [Laughter.]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member seems to be replying to a Debate in the House of Lords, which is out of order.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that he had not intended to do that.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is out of order to refer to the Debate, and the hon. Member is not only referring to it, but is replying to a speech by the Lord Chancellor.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that to contend that, because the Bill had been examined by this Joint Committee, it must therefore be withdrawn from the consideration of the House, was a contention against which he must protest. The mere breathing over the Bill of the magic word "consolidation," did not exempt it from the ordinary procedure. A Consolidation Bill was one which consolidated all the statutes relating to one subject; but this Bill did not fulfil that definition. It did not deal with the packet service, with the telephones, the telegraphs, or the parcels post. It only consolidated part of the law. The memorandum of the Bill claimed for it that it made "such alterations of the law only as are required for uniformity of expression and adaptation to existing law and practice, and does not embody any substantial amendment of the law." Surely the House of Commons ought to be allowed to form its own opinion on that subject. He would show that substantial amendments of the law were made. The memorandum of the Bill said:—

> "It is identical with that which passed the Joint Committee last year, except that Clauses 27 and 32 have been altered so as to give effect to the repeals effected by the Public Health Act of last Session (59 and 60 Vict. c. 19), and words have been introduced in Clause 74 to make it clear that the operation of s. 2 of the Public Accounts and Charges Act 1891 (54 and 55 Vict. c. 24) is preserved."

The Bill of last year, which was said to be identical with this one, provided that, in spite of any other Act of Parliament, the fines, forfeitures, and other sums should be paid into the Exchequer. But it was then discovered by the Solons of the Committee, whose work was too sacred to be touched, that they had practically repealed the Act of 1891, which provided that all money directed by the Treasury to be applied as an appropriation in aid, should be so applied without being paid into the Treasury. Section 2 of the present Bill gave the Treasury power to fix the rates and charges on postal packets. That applied to all postal packets; and therefore it took away the express statutory right of newspapers to be carried for a halfpenny. Section 20, again, which prescribed certain rules for the registration of newspapers, now restricted the rules which were before general. Not only that, it provided that every page of a newspaper after the first should bear the title and date of publication, wholly or in part. The words, "the whole or part of," were quite new. The decisions of the Courts were based upon the phraseology of Acts of Parliament, and the alteration of that phraseology might mean the destruction of a whole fabric of decisions of the Courts upon which the law was at present administered. That was one of the dangers of this Consolidation Bill. He did not object to consolidation. He objected to an advantage being taken of consolidation to alter the law, as in the case of the present Bill, and he protested against such action being coupled with the declaration that the House should not closely examine Bills of this character. Every Bill that came into the House should be subjected to the examination of the House. He had never known a Bill that had not left the House the better for that examination, and in the case of a Bill of this kind, with numerous provisions dealing with complicated matters, the most careful consideration was absolutely necessary. The Bill was presented to the House in the false guise of a Consolidation Bill. It was meant to further the small conveniences of an overworked and perhaps not very capable Department. He knew of no Department which was so continually construing Acts of Parliament, and was so absolutely incapable of doing it than the Post Office Department. He could give twenty instances of the incapacity of Post Office officials to construe Acts of Parliament, and as the Bill was introduced to relieve them of the difficulty of construing Acts of Parliament by altering the Acts to the way they wanted to construe them that he objected to the Bill.

MR. BARTLEY seconded the Amendment. He thought the gradual consolidation of statutes was a valuable work, and that Bills having that object in view should be allowed to pass rapidly through the House. But the danger of most Consolidation Bills was that opportunity was taken to put, as the Departments thought, a certain number of things right, but which really amounted to amendments of the law. That was his hon. Friend's objection to the Bill, and he formally seconded his hon. Friend's Amendment in order that the House might have a statement as to the real effect of the Bill.

MR. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock) said his objection to the Bill was not so much that it left out things but that it consolidated faults. A fault was bad, but consolidated faults were worse. There was one fault particularly which he thought most objectionable. Under Clause 46 of the Bill the Postmaster General was to have power, with the consent of the Treasury, to purchase land for the purposes of the Post Office; and the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act was to apply. Under that Act it was possible for a man who was unwilling to sell his land to get 10 or 15, and indeed in some cases 20 per cent. more for his land because it was taken from him compulsorily. That was a most objectionable provision, because it was a direct incentive to a landowner to refuse to give his land for any public or useful purpose. It was quite true that the interests of private owners of land should be safeguarded; but they should not encourage private owners to behave badly to the public; and he contended that by the application of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act they were giving a direct inducement to landowners to behave badly to the public. He hoped, therefore, the Government would omit the application of that Act to purchasers of land under the Bill.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury) appealed to his hon. Friend the Member for King's Lynn to withdraw his opposition to the Second Reading, in order that Amendments might be moved to the Bill in Committee. The Bill afforded the first opportunity for many years of moving Amendments to the present Post Office law, and it was probable there would not be such a chance again for many years to come. He had put down several Amendments—one of which was that the Postmaster General should be a Member of the House of Commons—which he was sure would be acceptable to the people of the country, and under the circumstances he trusted his hon. Friend would not go to a Division against the Second Reading.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs) said the work done by the Joint Committee was exceedingly laborious and difficult; it was largely done by skilled draftsmen, and there were also skilled lawyers upon the Committee. The work must be in a certain degree imperfect—that much should be conceded to human frailty—but every care was taken to prevent any mistake or any substantial alteration of the law. They might have to deal with from 20 to 40 Acts of Parliament in preparing a Consolidation Bill, and it was almost impossible to avoid infinitesimal alterations in the law. It was certainly necessary to alter the phraseology. He did not want to enter into any question which had arisen between the Lord Chancellor and an equally great luminary of that House as to whether the Lord Chancellor took the right view of what ought to be taken in the House of Commons, but he did say all this work done by the Joint Committee was work of a character which could not be done there. This was work which ought to be tenderly regarded by both Houses of Parliament if it had been done honestly, as it certainly had. His hon. Friend the Member for King's Lynn complained that there had been an alteration in the law, while his hon. Friend the Member for Tavistock said they ought to take this opportunity of legislating with reference to the Lands Clauses Act of 1845. The hon. Member for Canterbury had hailed this as a splendid opportunity for altering the whole scope of the Post Office law, but if that course were adopted it was no use putting this irksome labour upon the Committee, and they had better give up consolidation altogether. He did not think Consolidation Acts ought to be discouraged, on the contrary, he thought that the fault of our legislation was that we did not legislate scientifically. Every Member of that House had the right to propose Amendments to a Bill, and some Amendments were adopted under pressure or for Parliamentary reasons, without sufficient appreciation of the scope of the change which would be made in a particular Act. For his own part he should like to see the Houses of Parliament laying down the principle as to what the law should be in a series of Resolutions, and leaving it to skilled persons to frame the law in accordance with those Resolutions, as was done in some foreign Legislatures. He was afraid, however, he could hardly look forward to so conservative an Assembly as our own adopting such a system. In the long Bill they were now considering he did not think the hon. Member for King's Lynn could point to any important change in the law. The point he had referred to came before the joint Committee, and it was resolved to insert the words to which attention had been drawn in order to preserve the law as it existed. As to the right of a newspaper to be carried for a halfpenny, he did not think that was changed. He would suggest that in future a list should be made of all those cases in which the Joint Committee considered they had altered the law at all, and that this list should be placed in front of the Consolidation Bill when it came to be considered by Parliament. But if they were to have Consolidation Bills criticised at length in that House, or if the complaint was to be made that they did not comprise desirable changes in the law, it would be a very great mistake to continue the system of consolidation. He hoped the House would not accept the Amendment, as it would be very unsatisfactory if all the labour of the Joint Committee were to be thrown away.

Mr. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) said that, as a member of the Joint Committee since its commencement, and one of those most regular in their attendance, he thought it only right to say that he had never observed the slightest pretension or desire on the part of the Committee to alter the law. He could assure the House that they had been most jealous on every occasion to adhere to the rule that there should be no Amendment of the law. Such alterations as were involved in the piecing of one set of words to another were, of course, absolutely necessary. The observations which had been quoted from the Lord Chancellor were made with reference to an Amendment that was upon the Paper of that House, and did not propose to point out that the Bill had gone beyond the lines of mere consolidation. When an Amendment to a Bill had been made—he recollected one such case—the special attention of the House had been called to it by the Report of the Joint Committee. He urged that the work of consolidation should not be mixed up with new reforms which might be desired.

Sir C. CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton) denied that the Bill would deprive newspapers of their existing statutory privileges. These they derived under the Act of 1870, and he did not find this among the statutes repealed in the schedule. It appeared to him that the proposal with regard to registration was to secure that a registered newspaper should be deemed to be a newspaper for the purpose of any arrangement between the British Government and the Government of any British possession with regard to the contents. The effect of the Bill would be to define newspapers for international and colonial purposes.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said that Ireland had been greatly neglected in regard to the consolidation of the statutes applying to it, and he therefore appreciated all the more what the Government proposed to do in reference to Ireland. At the commencement of the Session the English Law Officers seemed anxious to improve the law by consolidating a series of Acts and enabling them to be more accessible. He appealed to the Attorney General for Ireland to take similar steps with regard to Irish statutes, but failed to induce him to do so. Chief Baron Palles, one of the greatest Judges in the United Kingdom, recently had before him an important question arising out of the Irish Poor Law. In his judgment he said he had had to consider a long tangle of statutes which ought to have been consolidated years ago, but, as they were Irish statutes, they seemed to be thought good enough for Ireland, and it was no one's business to set them right. Ireland only got the benefit of the consolidation of the law when the work was undertaken for the whole of the United Kingdom. As to separate consolidation of Irish statutes, there seemed to be little prospect of anything being done. With great respect to the hon. Member for Lynn Regis, Departmental Acts like Post Office Acts were the very class of Acts which most needed consolidation. Statutes of practical every-day importance, to which constant reference was made, and which lawyers had at their fingers' ends, did not need consolidation so much, and the absence of consolidation in respect to these was not felt so much. The Bill did not go far enough, but, as far as it went, it served a useful purpose. He agreed that where the principle of the law was altered, it should be done by statutory enactment. But a long series of statutes was bound to contain many absurdities and anomalies. There was no reason why these should be preserved and perpetuated, and it was right that they should, if possible, be eliminated.

The defining of what a newspaper really was should be left in the hands of sensible officials. It appeared that newspapers, registered as such, prior to 1859 had privileges which newspapers registered since had not. The Post Office at Cork had refused to accept as newspapers certain newspapers in that part of Ireland which issued literary supplements. At last, after many communications between the proprietors and the Postal officials, the word "supplement" was abandoned, and—hey, presto!—the Postmaster General accepted it. If any large change in the law were made, it should be done by the House as a whole, but he contended that those who carried out the consolidation of statutes were entitled to make alterations in detail and remove absurdities and anomalies.

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs) agreed with the hon. Member for Cork as to the importance of the consolidation of the law being carried out, and hoped he might join in the appeal to the hon. Member for Lynn Regis not to press his Motion. ["Hear, hear!"] The question before the House was far more important than any which related to this particular Measure, for it really was a question of whether the House should elect to adopt a course of procedure which would absolutely put an end to the useful work of the consolidation of the statute law of England. He admitted that every hon. Member had a right to criticise any Bill that came before the House, but at the same time he thought the common sense of the whole House would recognise that if such a right were to be exercised to the extreme limit, and every Consolidation Bill were to be submitted to minute criticism, they might give up the attempt altogether to consolidate the law of England. ["Hear, hear!"] The consolidation of statutes required that careful attention should be paid to the language. It was work which could only be done round a table, and it was preposterous to suppose that in a Committee of that House work of that kind could be done which could, however, safely enough be intrusted to a Committee whose duty it was not to alter the law, but to consolidate and avoid any substantial alteration of the law, and put the enactments which at present existed in such a form that they would be of some practical use to any lawyer not familiar with the work of the Department who had occasion to deal with the subject-matter. ["Hear, hear!"] There was one portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Lynn Regis which he really must notice. The hon. Member said that Consolidation Bills were introduced from time to time for the purpose of carrying out series of changes which the Department thought desirable. That was a statement to which he must give the most emphatic contradiction, and he thought that in making it the hon. Member must have been insensibly under the bias of the series of controversies he had with the Post Office in past days, in which, according to his own account, he was always right and the Post Office always wrong. [Laughter.] The hon. Member said it was not a Consolidation Bill because it did not consolidate everything. Could anything be more absurd? They must proceed by degrees in consolidation. The Bill dealt with 20 Acts relating to the Post Office, and put them in a form which would be useful to all who had occasion to inform themselves with regard to the law on these matters. Extreme care had been exercised in regard to the Bill to insure that there should be no alteration of the law, which had been left substantially as it was before. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for South Islington seconded the Motion, but at the same time said he was keenly alive to the importance of consolidation, and should deeply regret that the House should commit itself to any course of action which would prevent the passage of Consolidation Acts. But the hon. Member must feel that if such a Motion as this were accepted by the House, the death-blow would be dealt to consolidation. The hon. Member for Islington suggested that they should have consolidation in the sense of reproducing the Acts as they were, treating them consecutively. Would not consolidation such as that be mere waste-paper? There would be a series of confused and fragmentary enactments, one after another, and the public would have to pick out from that heterogeneous mass what the law was. The consolidation which the public and lawyers who were not specialists desired was consolidation which put together enactments in a shape which could be read and comprehended by anyone not familiar with all the technicalities. ["Hear, hear!"] Again, the hon. Member for Devonshire said that extensive alterations ought to be made in the Bill, and that the House ought to embark on the consideration of the whole subject of the Lands Clauses Acts and the power of acquiring land for Government and public bodies. He asked the hon. Member whether he did not think the last branch of the inquiry would seal the death-warrant to any such measures of consolidation? The Bill might as well be thrown out on the Second Reading as exposed to the fire of such Amendments and such vital alterations as the hon. Member for Devonshire suggested. The Statute Law Revision Committee in these matters of consolidation was careful to avoid any alteration in the law, but it was no use reprinting old statutes exactly as they stood. Language in the year 1830 had not the same meaning as in 1897. The circumstances had changed, and they must adapt the language of their consolidation to the circumstances with which they were dealing. The Committee having charge of this consolidation had taken a great deal of trouble to avoid any substantial alteration in the law while putting together the enactments in such a shape as to be of practical use. He hoped the House would pass the Second Reading of the Measure, and not allow the useful work of statute law consolidation to be interfered with. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES, having made his protest, asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time, and committed for Thursday.

EXTRAORDINARY TITHE BILL.

*The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Walter Long, Liverpool, West Derby), in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, explained that it proposed to remove two difficulties which had arisen since the compromise on this subject in 1886. Part of that compromise was to the effect that, whereas extraordinary tithe rent-charge would only have been charged on that portion of the farm subject to extraordinary cultivation, the future tithe rent-charge should be fixed at a sum then arranged, and should apply to the whole, and not merely to part of the farm. Unfortunately, by a case which had been recently heard, that compromise had been upset, and so a part of the compromise—and a very important part from the title-owners' point of view—had not been effective. The other small change the Bill sought to make had regard to sales. When a property came for division in consequence of a sale, the Board of Agriculture had no power to apportion extraordinary tithe rent-charge as it had to apportion ordinary charge. The Bill sought to remove the injustice in the one case, and to give the Board of Agriculture the same power in the second case as they had in regard to ordinary tithe.

Bill read a Second time, and committed for Thursday.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS (HOLIDAYS) BILL.

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the Third time, and passed.

VOLUNTEERS BILL.

EXPLANATION OF 26 AND 27 VICT. C. 65, SS. 24, 27.

For removing doubts, it is hereby declared that the power under section twenty-four of the Volunteer Act 1863, to make rules with respect to a Volunteer Corps shall extend, and be deemed to have always extended, to rules for securing the efficiency of the members of the Corps, and that a fine for the breach of any rule made under that power shall not be deemed to be a civil debt.

MR. PICKERSGILL moved to add to the Clause the following words:—

> "Provided that, notwithstanding anything contained in section fifty-two of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, the provisions of section four of the said Act respecting the mitigation of penalties by the court, and that the corresponding provisions of section six of the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Act 1881, notwithstanding anything contained in the last-named section, shall respectively apply to proceedings taken under this Act."

The hon. Member stated that his object was simply to bring the Bill into conformity with the general law. If this Bill passed as it stood the power of mitigating penalties would be taken away with regard to such offences as the Bill dealt with. It was very much worse when this power was given to Voluntary Associations such as Volunteer Corps. He ventured to make an appeal to the Attorney General. He hoped he would preserve his independent judgment, which he feared was somewhat overborne by the War Office. He sometimes feared that that House had not that regard for personal liberty which had distinguished it in times past. He was a warm advocate of the Volunteer Service, but if they passed this offensive enactment they would not be doing it any advantage or increasing its popularity. For these reasons he begged to move his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) said if the hon. and learned Member had an opportunity of ascertaining the facts in connection with the Act of 1879 he would see that it was not possible for him to advise the House to accept this Amendment. The hon. Member spoke of the Bill as an oppressive Bill, and said they should not have such a power in it. He thought the hon. and learned Member took a somewhat exaggerated view. What was here provided had been in force since 1863 and had worked well. It was found, however, that the existing Acts were not sufficient to carry out the object aimed at, and the Bill was simply a Measure to put the law into the condition which everyone believed it was in since 1863. Not a single word had been said to show that the law had worked unfairly or that any injustice had been done. He must ask the House not to accept the Amendment.

MR. PICKERSGILL thought this was an extremely important matter, and said he must press the Amendment to a Division.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2,—

SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the Volunteer Act 1897.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

MR. PICKERSGILL moved the insertion of the following new Clause:—

TERMINATION OF IMPRISONMENT.

If, before the expiration of the term of such imprisonment, such a proportion of the fine be paid that the term of imprisonment suffered is not less than proportional to the part of the fine still unpaid, the imprisonment shall terminate.

Clause Read a First time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL accepted the clause, which was Read a Second time, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, as amended; to be considered to-morrow.

APPEAL IN CERTAIN CIVIL MATTERS (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

APPEAL IN CASES STATED IN CIVIL MATTERS.

The jurisdiction and power to hear and determine appeals conferred by section twenty-four of the Judicature Act (Ireland) 1877, is hereby extended and shall apply to any Order or decision made by the High Court in Ireland or any Judge thereof, under any of the enactments set out in the schedule to this Act, anything in any of the said enactments to the contrary notwithstanding.

MR. MAURICE HEALY moved, after the word "made," to insert the words, "after the passing of the Act." He said the Bill affected procedure only, and as it now stood it would operate retrospectively, which he was sure was not the intention of the Government. The decision of the Court of Queen's Bench was final, but unless his Amendment were accepted, every decision given by the Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Exchequer on a case stated in the past twelve months could be appealed against.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. JOHN ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.) accepted the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to;

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act 1897, and may be cited with the Judicature (Ireland) Acts 1877 to 1888.

On the Question "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill,"

MR. MAURICE HEALY pointed out that there was an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Dublin University (Mr. Carson)—[To move the following Clause,—

The persons upon whose recommendation the Lord Lieutenant may make, alter, or annul rules, pursuant to section sixty-one of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act 1877, shall include the President of the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland for the time being, and shall also include two persons (one of whom shall be a practising barrister) to be appointed for the purpose by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland from time to time in writing under his hand, such appointment to continue for such time as shall be specified therein.]

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said he passed the Amendment over because it was out of order.

MR. MAURICE HEALY said the title of the Bill was drawn apparently to exclude an Amendment of this kind. But if this were a Bill to amend the Irish Judicature Acts, as it purported to be by the short title, he submitted that the Amendment of the Member for Dublin University, being merely a proposal to amend the Judicature Acts, would be in order.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS said he had considered the matter very carefully. If the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Dublin University had been confined to the cases dealt with in the Bill, it would have been in order. But it went very much beyond that, and therefore it went beyond the scope of the Bill. The title was not the only guide to what was in the Bill, but the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Dublin University went beyond the subject-matter of the Bill, and therefore it was not in order.

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked whether, at a later stage, it would be open to the Attorney General for Ireland to admit the principle which was advocated by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, and to get this principle into the Bill.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND said he entirely approved of the principle embodied in the Amendment, and should have been glad to accept it if it had been in order. If the opportunity arose on a subsequent occasion, on which such an Amendment would be in order, he would be happy to consider it.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

On the question "That the Bill, as amended, be reported to the House,"

MR. MAURICE HEALY asked the Attorney General whether, between this stage and Report, he would consider the advisability of allowing the appeal granted by this Bill to be taken direct to the Court of Appeal instead of to the Court of First Instance. The effect of multiplying these appeals was really to increase the cost of litigation.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS: That Question hardly arises on the question that I Report this Bill to the House.

SPEECHES IN PARLIAMENT.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.) rose to call attention to the duration of speeches in Parliament, and to move:—

> "That the duration of speeches in this House has increased, is increasing, and should be abated."

He said that he rose with diffidence to move this Resolution, because he was aware that it was not for a humble agricultural Member of a dozen years' standing in the House to suggest a change in the procedure of the House which had lasted for two centuries. He reminded the House that he and some hon. Friends had introduced a Bill having for its object the shortening of the duration of speeches in Parliament. He admitted that the Measure was crude, yet on a division he obtained a majority of 70 in favour of it. He thought that the majority of hon. Members, however conservative their views, would not deny that there was some necessity for a modification of the rules of procedure under which the Debates were carried on. Some hon. Members might remember a Debate, 14 years ago, when an hon. Gentleman spoke from noon until 4 o'clock in the afternoon. [Laughter.] Last Session a right hon. Gentleman spoke on one occasion for three hours and ten minutes, and hon. Members who were Irish landlords and connected with Ulster constituencies were not likely to forget either the speech or its results. In the Financial Relations Debate the other day an hon. Gentleman, known in two continents, made a speech which lasted for two hours and ten minutes, or, rather, he read a speech of that duration. [Laughter.] Then there were right hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who never thought of speaking under an hour. [Laughter, and cries of "Name!"] They also knew hon. Members who made it their boast and pride that they never rose to address the House under 40 minutes. Such was the exuberance of dialectical ability in the last Parliament, that one hon. Member spoke on a sub-head (B) of the Estimates for half an hour on every Estimate, or whenever Supply was taken. That hon. Member was a lusus naturæ, and the House was not likely to see many like him again. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen had said to him, "Why is it you cannot leave the rules of procedure alone? What was good enough for our predecessors is good enough for us." That was rather a specious argument, but it admitted of a straight answer. There was a Latin or Greek poet—he was brought up at Eton, but his education had been neglected—[laughter]—who said, "Times change, and we change with them." He recalled to the recollection of the House that in earlier years some names continually recurred in Debate like recurring decimals. The majority of hon. Members in those days sat and listened, waiting, as the right hon. Member for West Monmouthshire had said, their apotheosis, or translation to the House of Lords. [Laughter.] These Gentlemen did not speak, and the less they spoke the sooner they got their promotion. [Laughter.] Their descendants at the present time sat in the House of Lords, and they attended the sittings of that Assembly as infrequently and spoke as seldom as their fathers did in the House of Commons. But this was not the way in which the business of the House of Commons was conducted at the present time. Hon. Members had to attend, and to make speeches on behalf of their constituents, and to introduce Bills whether they liked them or not. He himself once introduced a Bill for the compulsory marking of shrimps—[laughter]—in obedience to the orders of his constituents, and he was bound to say that the Bill did not take its place on the statute-book. [Laughter.] There were several precedents for imposing a time limit on speeches. There was a reference in The Times the other day to what happened 50 years ago, when Lord John Russell proposed a Motion, to which Mr. Milner Gibson moved an Amendment, allowing hon. Members to speak only for an hour, though Mr. Milner Gibson said that he preferred 40 minutes. Two distinguished Members of the House who voted with Mr. Milner Gibson were Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden, and the Amendment was only lost by 26 votes in a moderately full House. Then in the House of Representatives at Washington the time limit, which was very short, was strictly carried out; it was only five minutes. [Cheers and laughter.] In the House of Convocation, in the United Service Institution, in the Poor Law Conference, the time limit was strictly enforced. If hon. Gentlemen read Gibbon they would find that 2,000 years ago in Rome, in the days of Julius Cæsar—[laughter]—the Emperor was said to have been much annoyed at the exuberant verbosity of certain senators, and he ordered these senators to be imprisoned. [Laughter, and "Hear, hear!"] The majority of the Senate, however, did not wish to see members of their body shut in the Clock Tower, and, afterwards, according to the historian, such was the flow of eloquence that decent debate was subsequently impossible. In moving this Resolution he did not address his remarks to the Front Benches. When right hon. Gentlemen chose they spoke as long as they liked, and as long as the House lasted this would always be so. He addressed himself rather to the private Member who was shut out of debate by the prolixity of right hon. Gentlemen. The Debate on the Financial Relations, for example, lasted three days; but scores of Members did not enjoy the chance of speaking. Then there was an agricultural Debate on a Motion made by the hon. Member for St. Helens. He did not think that was likely to bring about a millennium in the rural districts, and he should have liked to say so, but it was impossible—the whole time was gone and the Debate was over. Although he and his Friends had taken particular care not to put any time limit in the Resolution, his own idea was that if right hon. Gentlemen could not liberate their soul in an hour, and if private Members could not say all they had to say in 15 minutes, then they did not know their trade and were not fit to occupy a seat in this House. [Laughter and cheers.] He and his Friends had not canvassed or button-holed any Members in the Lobby to support this Resolution; they had agreed to run the Resolution on its own merits, in the sporting phraseology which Lord Salisbury had adopted. If the right hon. Gentlemen would support the Resolution they would be received by their countrymen, when they went down in the autumn to address them, with more gratitude than if they had brought in half-a-dozen Education Bills—[laughter]—and private Members would be received by their constituents in the words of "Alice in Wonderland:"—

> "And hast thou slain the Jabberwock?
> Come to my arms, my beamish boy."

[Laughter.]

Mr. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Hereford), in seconding the Motion, said no innovation either in principle or in practice was advocated. Those who had been long in Parliament had witnessed many changes all tending to the limitation of Debate. He need only refer to the different varieties of the Closure which in the last ten years had sprung into being, the reduction in the number of stages through which a Measure had to pass. In the Debates of 1849 Mr. Hume mentioned that in his day an hon. Member had 17 opportunities during the course of a Measure of speaking upon it; now the opportunities were reduced to about eight. The evil now lay not so much in the length of speeches as the frequency of some speakers in addressing the House—[laughter]—and the fact that they frequently repeated their own arguments and, perhaps, more frequently repeated the arguments of other Members. Private Members were not entirely to blame for the desultory character of the speeches. From the mode in which business was arranged, from the uncertainty which attaches to the time or the opportunity on which any given subject might actually come on for Debate, it was scarcely worth the while of any private Member who had anything else to do to get up the subject thoroughly, because he never knew whether he would be able to deliver his sentiments, whether the time would serve, whether the Debate would come on, or whether he would be able to catch Mr. Speaker's eye as it revolves in its orbit. [Laughter.] As was observed by the eminent Statesman who took part in the discussion of 1849, "it was the uninformed themselves who had not thoroughly considered the subject who make the long speeches." ["Hear, hear!"] It had been calculated that, taking the ordinary duration of the Parliamentary Session and making allowance for holidays, counts-out, and so forth, the House spent in actual Debate something like 1,000 or 1,100 hours. Take it at 1,050. They might allot to the occupants of the Treasury Bench 300 hours and to Members of the Front Opposition Bench 150; that would leave 600 hours to ordinary Members, or, say, an hour a-piece. But they all knew that the bulk of hon. Members were not habitual speakers, and that the delays and redundancies and repetitions were inflicted upon the House by the comparatively few. ["Hear, hear!"] There were about 100 Members who were the regular speakers in the House, and he suggested that to the House generally, exclusive of the Front Benches, 600 hours should be allotted in the Session. The speeches of every Member might be recorded, and when he had occupied three hours of his time the fact should be intimated to him. [Cries of "Divide!"] Members of the Government could divide the time placed at their disposal among themselves; and if anyone wished for an extension of his time, he could borrow it from a colleague. [Cries of "Divide!"] He begged to second the Resolution.

Sir JAMES FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) said that he could remember the House more than 40 years ago, and he thought it was a mistake to suppose that there ever was a golden age when there were no bores, and when there were no complaints of the length of speeches. In the olden days a prolix speaker, who did not command the respect of the House, was subjected to rather rude interruptions, which were, however, employed with discretion, and never without representing the feeling of the House. In those days just as much useful work was got through, though with a great deal less speaking, for it was not thought necessary for everyone to speak, nor for everyone who had prepared a speech to deliver it. [Cheers.] No doubt, on account of the fierce light which now beat on the proceedings of the House, hon. Members liked their constituents to know that they were not silent; but hon. Members could, surely, exercise some restraint in not prolonging Debate by repeating arguments which had been stated by others. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not think the time had come when any drastic or automatic machinery could be adopted to regulate Debate; and it would be a great misfortune if such expedients were resorted to. The good sense of the House had hitherto been sufficient, without any precise rules, to enable the House to boast that it was the model and mother of Parliaments. The measures which had been taken within the last ten years had restored the order that obtained in times past; and the Debates were now conducted with as much regularity and decorum as he could ever remember. [" Hear, hear! "]

Sir ELLIOTT LEES (Birkenhead) said that there was one person of whom complaint might justly be made, and that was the expert and specialist. Such a person had a right to be heard on the subject; but everyone had read his views beforehand in the magazines or newspapers. If such Members would only condense their arguments in the same way as they did in their letters to The Times, the Debates would gain considerably. [" Hear, hear! "] Some curtailment was necessary to restore the interest and brightness of the Debates. A real Debate was, indeed, seldom heard nowadays. It was generally a succession of essays. [" Hear, hear! "]

Mr. HENRY HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.) said that anyone who occupied a prominent position in the House, as did the right hon. Member for North-East Manchester, could always find an opportunity for taking part in Debate. But that was not the case with humbler Members, who on certain occasions ought to have more opportunity of expressing their views concisely. [" Hear, hear! "] He could not agree with the hon. Member for Hereford that there were no very recent examples of excessively long speeches. On the Third Reading of the Voluntary Schools Bill only 14 speakers were able to take part in the Debate, though it lasted the whole evening. The Financial Relations Debate occupied three days, on the first of which there were five speakers, on the second eight, and on the third only six. Yet that was a subject on which many Members felt a great interest. There were many many public bodies which had tried the experiment of limiting speeches, particularly the County Councils. On the Council with which he was connected, there was a particularly stringent rule, and the Standing Order had rarely to be suspended. The House might try the experiment, in the first place, on private Members' evenings. It might be said that public opinion would do all that was necessary; but the methods which were once effectual in hinting to a speaker that he had exhausted the patience were no longer effectual. He asked the House seriously to take into consideration this growing evil. [" Hear, hear! "]

Mr. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.) thought that some of the blame for the prolixity of Members was due to the Press. If an hon. Member condensed his observations within 20 minutes—which was long enough for the statement of his case—the gentlemen of the Reporters' Gallery cut down his remarks to a two minutes' speech. [Laughter.] The result of that system was to encourage Members to speak at undue length. The bore who occupied the attention of the House for a long time got some at least of his remarks reported, while the Member who made a short, bright speech, without the aid of notes, was dismissed with the line: " After some observations from Mr. A. B., the House divided." [Laughter.]

Mr. WALTER MORRISON (York, W.R., Skipton) said that when he first entered the House of Commons there was a Rule against the Reading, in the course of a speech, of any printed matter except extracts from the Debates or from Reports or Papers presented to Parliament; but nowadays it was quite a common thing for Members to equip themselves with printed quotations from newspapers and read them at great length. [" Hear, hear! "] He thought that if the rule objecting to the reading of printed matter were revived, and if, in consequence, hon. Members had to write out the extracts they wished to read, the length of speeches would be considerably reduced. [Laughter and " Hear, hear! "] He also thought the House ought to set its face against the growing habit of reading speeches in manuscript. [" Hear, hear! "] If an unofficial Member could not condense what he had got to say into a quarter of an hour, or a right hon. Gentleman what he had got to say into an hour, he ought to go to school again. [" Hear, hear! "] He recollected that when Lord Palmerston and Mr. Disraeli were the leading Members of the House and followed each other in Debate they usually occupied only one hour each, and in that time they were both able to state their points with admirable clearness and force.

The House divided:—Ayes, 85; Noes, 24.—(Division List, No. 203.)

INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY (JUDICIAL DUTIES, EXPENSE).

*Mr. CHARLES HARRISON (Ply- hoped the House would agree that the

> "That this House is of opinion that a portion of the expenses incurred by the Incorporated Law Society in fulfilling the duties imposed upon it by the Statute 51 and 52 Vic. c. 65, should be defrayed out of public funds."

He said the Motion was in principle adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year, but exception was taken on that occasion to the particular form in which the Resolution was moved. He hoped the House would agree that the grant should be made out of public funds without any interception. Solitors on being articled paid stamp duty, they paid duty on admission, and they paid a duty for the purpose of being at liberty to practise their profession; and the funds thus contributed to the public Exchequer amounted to no less than from £180,000 to £190,000 a year. It was not necessary for the professional solicitor to belong to any society, and he could not be expelled from the profession merely because the Law Society so desired. In former years the Rolls Court exercised jurisdiction, and cases of complaint were investigated by the Master of the Rolls, which resulted in great delays. In 1888 a reform took place, and the judicial duty of investigation was imposed upon the Incorporated Law Society, whose Reports were acted upon. He believed about a thousand cases had been investigated, and large payments had been made in the performance of this statutory judicial duty. The Reports and the work which had been done had been most highly spoken of by the present Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls. The Lord Chancellor had written to the President of the Society, in which he stated the functions of the Society appeared to him "both valuable and well performed;" and he recognised that they do a public service and save time and expense in the Courts which have jurisdiction in the matters of solicitors. As this judicial work involved considerable expense it was just that it should be paid out of public funds instead of being paid out of the voluntary subscriptions of this society. He begged to move the Motion. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. W. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow) seconded the Motion. He was satisfied that it was founded upon justice and policy. ["Hear, hear!"] This was not an act of "trade unionism;" what they asked for was not for the benefit of solicitors, but entirely in the interest of the public. It was found that no one could do this work so well as the Law Society, and so long as they gave their services for nothing, as was the case at present, it was only just that the expense involved in these investigations, which he believed amounted to about £5,000 a year, should be provided by the State.

Mr. THOMAS BUCKNILL (Surrey, Epsom) said he had the permission of the Lord Chancellor to say that he agreed fully with the spirit of the Motion. That was a high authority to start with. The matter should meet with the sympathy of the House, if for no other reason for this—that, instead of the old-fashioned, dilatory process of proceeding in the first instance by affidavit, then the matter being referred to a master, proceeding before the master as if he were a Judge, and considering the report of the master, the modern and excellent practice had been created by statute of a committee of the Incorporated Law Society considering each case brought before them, and, if they thought fit, making a report of it to the Court of Queen's Bench. A great saving of time and expense had been effected by the machinery provided by the Act of 1888. When the subject was last before the House the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed himself favourable to the consideration of the matter. It had been said that, if solicitors chose to consider the ways of peccant members of that branch of the legal profession, they should be glad to do it within closed doors at their own expense. But this was not true. The Statutory Committee considered whether on the facts brought before them the matter should go further or not, and they often paid the costs on one side or the other out of their own pocket. When the report of the Incorporated Law Society came before the Divisional Court of Queen's Bench the Judges had to say whether the report of the Incorporated Law Society was to be upheld or reversed. Everything showed that the present machinery for dealing with the matter was excellent. If it were so, why should the Incorporated Law Society be called upon to pay the expense out of their own pocket? If it led to a saving of public time and expense, ought not the Society to be reimbursed? He heartily supported the Motion.

*MR. MELLOR (York, W.R., Sowerby) said this was really a matter of simple justice. Not a large sum was asked for, and it was merely to reimburse the Incorporated Law Society for the expense they went to in discharge of a public duty. This had been extremely well performed since 1888, and it was a duty of great importance to the public. It was very much to the advantage of the public that complaints against solicitors should be inquired into by a body of gentlemen well qualified and of experience in that branch of the profession, who had command of all the necessary machinery. The Lord Chief Justice spoke not only for himself, but for the Judges of the Queen's Bench Division, in favour of the proposal, and the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chancellor also concurred. If these great authorities found the work of the committee of the Incorporated Law Society so valuable, surely the public ought not to allow them to be out of pocket, considering the hard work they undertook in the service of the public.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES held that when a proposal was made to tax the country to get solicitors struck off the rolls it should be made by a Minister of the Crown in Committee of the whole House. When the matter was before the House in July last the Leader of the Opposition said the Incorporated Law Society kept the rolls clean for their own sake, and had no more right to be paid for keeping them clean than an Inn of Court had to be paid for disbarring a barrister. He himself submitted that there was no ground for this demand to give £4,500 a year to a very respectable trade union. He believed the Incorporated Law Society was put to no expense at all. It had been said that until 1888 the duty of investigating complaints against solicitors was performed by the Court. If a man were to be driven out of his profession it should be by the Court. [HON. MEMBERS: "So it is."] The examination of the solicitor was no longer conducted in Court, but in private by a private society. All that came before the Court was the report of the society. The late Lord Bramwell, speaking on this subject, said the proper way to deal with a solicitor's professional conduct was in open Court, not in the secret chamber of any society, however respectable. ["Hear, hear!"] What he wanted to point out to the House was this. It was said that a duty was imposed upon the Society by the Act of 1888. He did not think that was a fair statement of the case. What was done by the Act of 1888 was to give this Society all the powers and privileges which they themselves had asked for. The only duty imposed upon them was, when they had held their inquiry, and come to their conclusion, that of presenting their report to the Court. There was nothing expensive about that. A sheet of foolscap paper and five minutes' time would suffice to make the copy that was presented to the Court. His belief was that no expense at all had been incurred by this Act. The Bill was introduced in the Autumn Session of 1888, and became law on the 25th December of that year. In the Report of the Incorporated Law Society of the preceding July, Sir Henry Watson Parker reported that—

> "the Council were of opinion that it would be to the interest of the profession that such powers should be sought for. The present process for punishing delinquent solicitors is complicated, involves unnecessary expense and a waste of energy, and the functions now exercised by the Court, at a considerable cost to the Society, can be well exercised by the Council alone."

It was upon the ground of economy alone that the Society demanded the extension to them of the powers which were formerly exercised by the Court. In the next Report, after the Act was passed, they proceeded to say that it was the opinion of the Committee that in ordinary circumstances a fee not exceeding three guineas should be sufficient to cover all professional charges of preparing and lodging the complaint, and providing the affidavit in support of it. The House would be gratified to learn that since the passing of the Act an average of only fourteen solicitors per annum had been struck off the roll. That would come to a matter of 42 guineas per annum, according to the estimate made in 1889 by the Incorporated Law Society themselves. They said that a fee of three guineas would suffice, therefore it was not £5,000 a year they should ask for, but £42 a year. But his belief was that it did not cost them even that. He found that the law expenses of the Incorporated Law Society in the year 1888, immediately before the passing of the Act, were £4,046, but in 1896 their law and Parliamentary expenses, including the cost of the Committee under the Solicitors' Act, 1888, were not £4,046, but only £3,767. It seemed to him, therefore, that the expenses had been absolutely less in the last year than they were in the last year before the Solicitors' Act was passed, and that, instead of this matter costing the Society more, it had cost them absolutely less. He did not, therefore, know upon what kind of ground this claim could be made. He admitted that when solicitors ran away with clients' money, or otherwise misbehaved themselves, it was the duty of this extremely respectable trades union to see that such delinquents were struck off the rolls, but he believed the method of examination enshrined in this Act was an unfortunate one. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton thought so at one time, because he found, on reference to the history of the Bill, that when it was introduced the right hon. Gentleman announced that he should strongly object to a good many of its clauses.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): And the Bill was altered.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES found no verbal record of the alterations in "Hansard." At any rate, it was not, in his opinion, altered sufficiently, and he only regretted that he was not earlier a Member of that Parliament, in which case, perhaps, he might have had a voice in the matter himself. He trusted it would not be thought he was an enemy of the honourable profession of solicitors, but he did not think, in the first place, on public grounds, that any private body whatever, for any purpose whatever, should receive a permanent charge of £5,000 from the taxpayers of this country. In the second place, he asserted that it had not in the least been made out that any case existed of extra expense having been incurred by this Society in consequence of the duties (as they were called) cast upon them by this Act; and, in the third place, he denied that any duties of an onerous nature had been cast upon them by the Act. The only duty was a duty of presenting a report, and all the rest the Act did was to give the Society privileges, advantages, and powers, which, he thought, it would have been much better not to have given, and which, when the Society asked for, they said not a word about their being likely to cause extra expense. On the contrary, the Report he had quoted showed that the suggestion was that, if this power were given to the Society, no extra expense would be incurred, but the cost would be less, and that was the one great ground put forward in the Report of the Society. In these circumstances, it did not lie in the mouth of the Society now to come and ask for public money on this ground. This was an academic discussion, for, whatever the result of the Resolution might be, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was not going to part with £5,000 except much better reasons could be given than had been adduced in the House that night.

*SIR EDWARD CLARKE (Plymouth) said so far as he was concerned as a Member of the Bar, it was a matter of absolute indifference whether the Motion was carried or not. His only interest was in seeing the discharge by a competent body of a serious and important public duty, and that was an interest common to all. But having had opportunities of judging of the value of this work, he would not be deterred by the sarcasm of the hon. Member for King's Lynn from saying a word about the matter. By the Act of 1888 an important public duty was transferred to the Committee of the Incorporated Law Society. Before that date it was necessary, in order that there should be an investigation into the conduct of a solicitor, that there should be a formal application to a court of law; and a great many persons who thought they had ground of complaint were unwilling to take what seemed to them the dangerous and expensive course of making such an application. For that procedure had been substituted simply the necessity of a communication, almost an informal communication, to the Incorporated Law Society. Directly that communication was received a committee consisting of some of the most experienced and most trustworthy solicitors in this country, investigated the complaint. If they found that there was no prima facie reason for instituting proceedings against the solicitor they dismissed the case; if they found that there was a prima facie case, they thereupon proceeded to procure a full investigation. Before 1888 the expenses of these proceedings were in great measure borne by the State. Now, instead of being conducted by a Master of the Queen's Bench paid out of the public funds, it was conducted by a committee of solicitors belonging to the Incorporated Law Society, who received no payment whatever for discharging duties which involved great sacrifices of their own time. Surely it was unreasonable, when Parliament had agreed to the scheme which set up this tribunal, and when, after nine years' experience, that tribunal was found to be far more effective and useful than the tribunal which existed before, to say to the solicitors: "You shall, in your certificate, duly pay to the State a sum of £180,000 a year. We have put upon you the discharge of an important public duty. That public duty being properly discharged by you, costs you a good deal of money, and we will not even make a rebate from the contribution which you make to the State in order to pay the expenses of your investigations." The Law Society stated deliberately that the expenses of the investigations amounted to an average of nearly £5,000 a year. That being so it seemed to him a matter of elementary justice that they should be allowed such an abatement for the contribution that they made to the public funds as might compensate them for the expense they incurred in the discharge of a public duty. [Cheers.] He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be able to give an assurance upon the matter. If he did he would secure the permanent, the effective, and the satisfactory discharge of these public duties, and would be discharging a debt and not in any way conferring a boon or a gift on a trade union. [Cheers.]

SIR HENRY FOWLER said the hon. Member for Lynn Regis had an encyclopædic knowledge of matters which came before the House. But there were subjects outside his range, and one on which he was profoundly ignorant was that branch of the legal profession to which he (Sir H. Fowler) had the honour to belong, and the working of the Incorporated Law Society. The hon. Member had referred to the part which he (the speaker) took in connection with the Act of 1888. The hon. Member was misinformed. He objected to the form of the Act as it was originally introduced, and he strove successfully to secure that this body, as it was to have judicial functions conferred upon it by the State, should be appointed, not by what the hon. Member, not happily, called a trade union, but by a public functionary. A clause was inserted providing that the power of appointment should rest exclusively with the Master of the Rolls, and that their procedure should be regulated by rules to be drawn up and approved of by the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, and the Master of the Rolls. His view was that, if this Committee was to have judicial duties intrusted to it, the Committee ought to be appointed by an independent body of the highest ability and competence. He did not suppose that the Law Society had any idea at the time of what ultimately the quantum of this procedure would be; but the work had been very well done. Only the other day, in a case that came before the Court of Appeal, the Master of the Rolls alluded in the strongest terms to the great assistance rendered to him and the Court by the careful and judicial investigation into the facts of the case by this Committee. Since 1888 nearly 1,000 cases had been investigated by it. The members of the Committee, whose time was emphatically their money, sat day by day during a long period of the year; they received no remuneration whatever, and the expenses which they asked the State to defray were payments to third persons. The amount of these payments averaged about £5,000 a year. A poor man robbed by a defaulting solicitor often had no means with which to institute a prosecution in Chancery proceedings, and, of course, anyone who was appointed to act for him had to be paid. The costs which the Incorporated Law Society paid to other people were solicitors' and counsel's fees. The Law Society were quite willing to discharge the duties intrusted to them, but they were not willing to tax themselves pecuniarily to the amount of £4,000 or £5,000 annually. That they should be expected to do so was not fair, for they were protecting the interests of the public and the State. The Judges, by the way in which they had treated the Committee's reports, had shown that they were perfectly satisfied. The statement that the Committee's proceedings were costing £4,000 or £5,000 a year was not made haphazard. The figures had been verified before the Treasury officials and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was a very careful guardian of the public purse, and not a man at all likely to listen to a sentimental or imaginary grievance. For his part, he was quite willing as a Member of that House to leave it to the right hon. Gentleman to determine what was the proper sum to pay to the Incorporated Law Society. The facts were very simple. Here was a body appointed by Parliament to discharge judicial duties entailing very heavy expenditure. Those duties had been performed to the satisfaction of the authorities and the public, and surely it was not reasonable that men who devoted their time, ability, and attention to these matters should also be called upon to defray the cost of investigations and proceedings out of their own pockets. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) said that he was not prepared to agree to expenditure simply because it was recommended by even such great personages as the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, and the Master of the Rolls. Those legal luminaries did not always agree, and although they did agree on this subject, it was not on account of such agreement that he would be disposed to sanction this expenditure. Nor did he think that any society regulating any profession or trade for the advantage of its members, and also for the advantage of the public, was necessarily entitled to claim a grant from that House. But the Incorporated Law Society was in a peculiar position, because the profession of a solicitor was one in which it was necessary for laymen like himself to have implicit confidence, and if that confidence was misplaced and fraud was committed, it often happened that the client was too poor to obtain any remedy himself or to take action to protect the public against similar frauds in the future. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore, to a certain extent the Incorporated Law Society and the solicitors' profession did stand in a different position from that of most other professions or trades. This subject was brought before him last year, and he investigated it very carefully, and the result was that he felt himself justified in making a proposal to Parliament in the sense of the Motion now before the House. That proposal, however, was not accepted. It was opposed mainly on the ground that there would be an interception of a tax before the tax reached the Exchequer. He was not, however, acting without precedent, for under an Act passed not long ago the King's Inns in Dublin had received similar assistance for certain necessary work done with regard to the profession of the Bar in Ireland, and in making his proposal he had but imitated what Parliament had done in their behalf. He, however, felt the force of the objection, and did not press his proposal. The hon. Member for Plymouth had brought the matter forward again that evening with the object of obtaining from the House an acceptance of the view that in some way or other the assistance which was desired by the Incorporated Law Society should be given by Parliament. That was a matter which he would like to leave to the House. There was one point which appeared to him to differentiate this case from almost any other that could arise, and that was, that there was a special tax on the profession of solicitors—["hear, hear!"]—and that, as the profession was specially taxed, undoubtedly there might be a claim from it which could hardly arise from any other profession, that a portion, and not a large portion, of that tax should be allowed, so to speak, by Parliament to the Incorporated Law Society for performing statutory duties which everyone admitted were well performed, not only to the advantage of the profession itself, but also of the public. ["Hear, hear!"] He could only say that if it should be the pleasure of the House to affirm this Resolution, he should think it his duty to act upon it by submitting to the House a Vote for such a sum as, on investigation, might seem to him to be right. ["Hear, hear!"] He owned that he felt that it was placing this society perhaps in a somewhat invidious position; but at the same time it would unquestionably be a payment, not for any work they did for themselves, but for the necessary expenses they incurred in the performance of a public duty; and he did not think it would be a precedent which would be injurious to the Exchequer as forming grounds for similar claims on the part of anyone else, and therefore he was willing to leave the matter in the hands of the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

ASSISTANT COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL.

Second Reading deferred till Monday 14th June.

Order for Second Reading read.

*Mr. PERCY THORNTON (Clapham) moved, "That the Bill be now read a Second time." He explained that the Bill referred to vehicles used on country roads, and required them to carry lights during certain hours. In England bicycles were required to show lights at night, but in Ireland it was not so. Many accidents had happened and continued to occur owing to the present bye-laws being of a different character. A person might start in a county where lights were enjoined upon all carriages, and yet find that the day's journey concluded where no such rule was in existence. The agricultural interest objected to having to provide these necessary lamps, and urged that they would involve a tax upon an already overburdened industry.

AN HON. MEMBER called attention to the fact that there were not 40 Members present.

*MR. SPEAKER: There are 40 Members present.

*MR. THORNTON, resuming, urged that the purchase and the carrying of a lamp were not very expensive matters. The promoters of the Measure were prepared to meet any objection in a fair and comprehensive spirit. They did not propose to stand by every word, but were willing that the Bill should be sent to a Select Committee so that its provisions might be carefully scrutinised.

MR. ARTHUR JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke) pointed out that a county council had power to make bye-laws requiring vehicles passing along roads at night to carry lights, and that many councils had already made such bye-laws, and very oppressive to agriculturists they had proved to be. It was absurd to suppose that carts or waggons going at a walking pace promoted collisions, and if his hon. Friend intended to persevere with the Measure he trusted that the hon. Gentleman would consent to the introduction of an Amendment exempting such vehicles from the necessity to carry lights. In Hampshire the County Council had passed a bye-law requiring all vehicles except those used for agricultural purposes and those going at a walking pace to carry lights. If the hon. Member for Clapham would agree to such an Amendment no harm could be done. The Bill as it stood had been considered by the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and the resolution was unanimously arrived at that the Measure would be very oppressive to agriculturists unless some Amendment of the kind he had described were inserted.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk) said that the Yorkshire Union of Agricultural Clubs had unanimously condemned the Bill if it was intended to apply to agricultural carts going at a walking pace. It was alleged that agriculturists thought expense would be caused to farmers if they were required to light their vehicles. There was more in the Bill than that, because it must provide for the imposition of fines if it was to have any effect at all. He thought it was a pity, in the present state of agricultural depression, that this Bill, which was in the interests of those who lived in towns, should be introduced. He thought it was a perfectly unnecessary bit of legislation as regarded these particular carts and waggons, and he hoped the House would reject it.

MR. FREDERICK CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich) was of opinion that the carrying of lights could only impose a small cost on anyone connected with agriculture, and he could assure hon. Members representing southern constituencies that people living near large towns, and especially those living near agricultural towns, had a great grievance in this matter. He thought all vehicles should carry lights. This would, he thought, simplify the case. A great source of danger was to be found in the milk carts which were left standing outside of a house while the milkman went to the house door. These did not carry lights, and he could assure hon. Members that if they were driving along the road when such a vehicle was left in the way, it was very difficult to prevent running into it. He thought this Bill would be of very great benefit to all members of the community.

*MR. HENRY HOBHOUSE thought this was one of those matters in which the House should be cautious how it took out of the hands of local authorities powers which were already vested in them. There was a great difference of opinion as to the wisdom of a rule like this. It was a subject constantly under the attention of different County Councils. It was quite true that some of them had recently made a bye-law in this direction, and it was equally true that others had qualified that bye-law by some such exception as had been proposed by the hon. Member for Basingstoke. He thought, therefore, they might say that the time was not yet quite ripe for any general rule of this kind. At the present moment he thought the agricultural districts would rather be left to the tender mercies of their own County Councils, who knew the local needs and could make bye-laws when they were required, than have a rigid and unbending rule like this imposed on the country as a whole.

MR. J. P. FARRELL said that Section 7 of the Bill applied to Ireland, and under the third Section an ordinary Irish tenant farmer's cart, no matter how small, in which he conveyed his produce to market, would have to provide a light when he was returning from market. This would be a great grievance to impose on the small tenant farmers in Ireland, many of whom were so poor that they could not afford to buy cart grease for their carts, let alone oil for lamps. Legislation like this affecting Ireland was absolutely unnecessary and tyrannical. It was quite proper that bicycles should be dealt with in large cities like London, where "scorchers" rushed along the streets at the rate of 20 to 30 miles an hour, but to apply a Bill like this in the country was to carry legislation to the verge of the farcical. He, therefore, strongly opposed the Bill.

MR. ROBERT ASCROFT (Oldham) spoke in the interests of young people who were cooped up in large towns, and who had few opportunities to escape from the smoke and the turmoil to enjoy the fresh air of the country. This Bill was not brought forward in the interests of those who could drive or ride, but in the interests of hundreds of thousands of young folks who were entitled after a hard day's work to get out of the smoke and inhale a little fresh air in the country. The opposition to this Bill came with a very bad grace from the agricultural party—[cheers]—after the way they had been treated in the Agricultural Rating Act. As to the interference of the Bill in Ireland, he would advise hon. Members from that country to do everything they could to encourage everybody to go there with a bicycle, because for every 6d. spent in oil and lamp thousands of pounds would be spent in the country.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth) thought the Bill was entirely unnecessary. Its provisions would be most dangerous at harvest time, when carts were loaded with highly-combustible material. It would, besides, be very inconvenient to compel farmers to have their carts lighted up with a petroleum lamp, when they had, perhaps, only 100 yards to go along a high road (after traversing half-a-mile of private road or field) to get to the farmyard. He could not see the slightest necessity for the House troubling itself with such a mischievous Bill.

MR. F. G. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) said his experience in driving was that heavy carts going at a walking pace along the road were the worst offenders, because they drove on the wrong side of the road, and nearly always the drivers were asleep. The annals of coaching days were full of anecdotes illustrating this. He agreed that there would be a certain amount of hardship at harvest time, but this might be met by regulations extending the time during harvest operations. The cost of a lamp must be small, and oil was very cheap. It was not often that farmers sent carts along the road. The great offenders were the heavy vans of the brewers. The Bill could do no harm to agriculture, and might prevent many accidents.

MR. W. O. CLOUGH (Portsmouth) supported the Bill on behalf of a large number of cyclists. On the Middlesex roads, the market gardeners' carts going to Covent Garden were a constant danger, and an accident had occurred to a member of his own family on account of them.

*Mr. A. K. LOYD (Berkshire, Abingdon) regretted that the hon. Member for Oldham had introduced into the Debate an antagonism between town and country in this question. The agricultural Members had as much sympathy with the cyclists as anyone else. He thought cyclists would agree that, considering the rough journeys farm carts had to undertake, and the inflammatory nature of many kinds of farm produce and of farm premises, often in isolated regions, the fewer unnecessary lamps and lucifer matches were called for, in connection with that industry, the better. These heavy carts went too slowly to be a danger to the traffic, and they made noise enough to be heard a mile off. It was not merely the desire to save the cost of the lamp-oil, but the desire to avoid any unnecessary duties and burdens, and to obviate the danger of fire, that led agricultural Members to ask for exemption from what might, in other respects, be a useful Bill.

Mr. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.) opposed the Second Reading of the Bill, as it tended to curtail the liberties and privileges of the Irish people. It might be necessary to have lights on carts and carriages in the crowded thoroughfares of London, but in Ireland one might travel miles upon miles without meeting a single vehicle on the roads; and when one was met with it was almost certain to be a donkey's cart. Again, in England policemen were so few that if an English farmer were to neglect to light up he would escape detection; but in Ireland policemen were as thick as blackberries—they were to be met at every corner; and there was, therefore, no chance for an Irish farmer to escape if he neglected to show a light on a donkey's cart. He was sure that the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill meant no evil to Ireland. But then the hon. Gentleman knew nothing about Ireland, and he would advise him in future to leave legislation to the Irish officials, who were paid for that sort of thing, or to the Irish Members, who knew something about the country.

Mr. R. G. WEBSTER claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.—Debate resumed.

Mr. JOHN BRIGG (York, W.R., Keighley) objected to the Bill principally because it proposed to override all the local regulations of the County Councils in regard to the carrying of lights by vehicles at night. In his own district the rule was that vehicles travelling faster than a walking pace should have lights. Again, in his district the roads were well lighted. There were 25 or 30 miles of roads lighted all the way with lamps, and there was no necessity that vehicles travelling on those roads should carry lights. The local authorities would consider it a great reflection on their action if any Act passed by that House overruled them, and he objected to the Bill, therefore, on their behalf.

Question put, "That the Bill be now Read a Second time." The House divided, and Mr. Percy Thornton, one of the tellers for the Ayes, announced the result as follows:—

Ayes	40
Noes	40

The announcement of the figures was received with laughter.

*Mr. SPEAKER thereupon said: The numbers being equal, it is my duty to vote, and in accordance with the usual practice of the Chair in such circumstances, I shall give it in such a way as will afford the House another opportunity of taking a decision on this matter. I therefore give my vote with the Ayes, and declare that the Ayes have it.

The Division List—No. 205—as appended, shows—Ayes, 44; Noes, 40.

Wednesday, 12th May 1897.

VEHICLES (LIGHTS) BILL.

Mr. Percy Thornton (Clapham) and Mr. Daly (Monaghan, S.), the Tellers for the "Ayes" in the Division yesterday on the Motion for the Second Reading of the Vehicles (Lights) Bill, came to the Table, and the former stated that he and his co-Teller, the hon. Member for Monaghan, had erroneously reported to the Speaker that the numbers voting for the "Ayes" in the Division on the Motion for the Second Reading of the Vehicles (Lights) Bill were 40, instead of 44, as appeared in the Division List.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the Tellers for the "Ayes" are agreed that there was a mistake, if the hon. Member will from his place move that the Journals of the House be corrected, I have no doubt that the House will agree to the Motion.

The hon. Members having returned to their places,

Mr. THORNTON moved that the Journals of the House be corrected accordingly. The hon. Member at the same time expressed his regret for the mistake for which he and his co-Teller were responsible. The error was the more to be regretted since it had caused Mr. Speaker to give an important ruling as to the course to be taken in case of an equality of votes, when in fact there had been no such equality.

Mr. DALY seconded the Motion, and also expressed his regret that the mistake should have occurred.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the Clerk do correct the said error in the Journal of this House by stating the number of the Ayes to be 44 instead of 40.—(Mr. Thornton.)

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. LECKY (Dublin University) moved, "That the Bill be now read a Second time." He said that the Measure provided that the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Act 1878, should be made perpetual, that it should be extended to the five Irish cities which had been hitherto exempted from its operation, that public-houses should be closed on Saturdays at 9 o'clock at night, and that the bonâ fide traveller limit should be increased to six miles. The House was doubtless aware that Sunday closing was much more popular outside England than within it. There were several reasons for this. One was that there was a real difference of opinion between England on the one hand and Scotland, Ireland, and the Colonies. In some cases also the difference was due to the fact that it was much easier to work such legislation in a spirit-drinking than in a beer-drinking country. Beer must be drank fresh, whereas, as had been truly and wittily said, if spirits did not keep it was not the fault of the spirits. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] Sunday closing had spread through nearly every colony of the British Empire, and had fully passed into the habits of the people. It had been adopted in all parts of Scotland as early as 1854, and no one had the least intention of repealing or modifying it. It had been adopted in the whole of Wales in 1882, and a Royal Commission in 1889 had attested its success. As far as regarded Ireland, in May 1876, a Resolution in favour of entire Sunday closing for all Ireland was carried in the House of Commons against the Government of the day by a majority of 57. In the following year a Select Committee of that House reported in favour of entire Sunday closing for all Ireland. In 1878 the Irish Sunday Closing Act, which provided for entire Sunday Closing in Ireland except in the cities of Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford, was passed as a tentative Measure for four years, being supported by a large majority of the Irish Members. It was soon found that it was a success. In 1880 a deputation waited upon the then Chief Secretary, Mr. Forster, to ask him, as representing the Government, to endeavour to have the Act made permanent. On that occasion Mr. Forster said:—

> "There can scarcely be any doubt that the Sunday Closing Act will be renewed by the Government that is in power. . . . As far as I can make out, public opinion has entirely gone with the operation of the Act."

In 1881, when the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill was before the House, Mr. Gladstone in the course of his speech said, referring to the proposal to exclude Cardiff from the operation of the Bill:—

> "We have had experience in Ireland of such exceptions in regard to this subject. In the Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland they were granted for the sake of passing the Bill rather than on the convictions of the party making the concession. But now I understand that Irish opinion, after the experience there has been, is altogether unfavourable to a continuance of these exclusions, and when the temporary Measure that was passed for Ireland comes to be renewed, undoubtedly Parliament will be asked to put an end to these exclusions and to pass a Bill for the whole of Ireland."

In 1882, when the Act was about to expire, a house-to-house canvass in the five exempted cities was made, with the following result:—In Dublin, 34,606 voted in favour of the entire closing of public houses on Sunday, and 8,117 against; in Belfast, 23,958 voted in favour of it, and 2,912 against; in Cork, 9,605 voted in favour of it, and 1,870 against; in Limerick, 5,600 voted in favour of it, and 550 against; and in Waterford, 3,495 voted in favour of it, and 290 against. The original Act, however, was not made permanent, and ever since 1882 it has been renewed year by year in the Expiring Laws Continuance Acts. In 1883 and 1884 Mr. Gladstone's Government brought in Bills to make it permanent, and to extend its provisions to the five exempted cities, but those efforts did not result in legislation. Sir G. Trevelyan, the then Chief Secretary, in moving the Second Reading of the Bill in June, 1884, said that he had come to the conclusion that Sunday closing had been a great and almost unmixed benefit to those parts of the country where it had been in operation, and that it might be hopefully and confidently extended to the five exempted cities. In 1888 a Select Committee was appointed to inquire into the working of the Act, and 35 witnesses were called before it. That Committee recommended that the Act of 1878 should be made perpetual, that the qualifying distance under the bonâ fide provision should be extended to six miles, and that all houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors in Ireland should be closed at 9 p.m. on Saturdays. A Bill in accordance with those recommendations was brought in, and the present Measure was identical with it. In 1890 the Bill passed the Second Reading of that House, the numbers being—for, 242; and against, 78. The Irish Members in favour of the Bill were as two to one. In 1891 the Bill was again read a Second time, by 248 to 94. In 1895 it was again read a Second time, by 170 to 71. It was then referred to the Grand Committee on Trade, but in consequence of the dissolution of Parliament it was lost. The principle of the Bill now before the House had been supported by Governments representing three different parties—the Liberal Party as it existed before the division in 1885, and the Party which is now on the opposite Benches, and the Party which is on this side of the House. It has been advocated by four Chief Secretaries. In 1889 a large deputation in favour of the Bill waited upon the present Leader of the House, then Chief Secretary for Ireland, when the right hon. Gentleman said:—

> "It has become clearly manifest that every man who has had the opportunity and the desire impartially to examine the results of this legislation in Ireland during the ten years in which it has been in force, has been driven, willingly or unwillingly, to the conclusion that that legislation has conferred vast benefits upon the population, and that it should, under no circumstances, be allowed to lapse. I have consulted the Prime Minister on the subject, and am authorised to say that if a Bill is not brought in as a Government Measure, we shall, at all events, do what we can to aid Mr. Lea, or whoever may have charge of it, to bring the controversy to a final conclusion."

In a subsequent speech, he said:—

> "I was, as Minister for Ireland, responsible for doing my best to pass through the House of Commons a Sunday-closing Bill for that country. The great mass of the population of every class, rank, and character were in favour of it."

The right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Morley) when Chief Secretary was equally emphatic. Replying to a deputation in 1892, he said:—

> "Nothing shall be left undone on my part to give all the facilities that the subject requires, and to enable Sir Thomas Lea, or > whoever else has charge of the Bill, to bring to an end what is really almost a scandal. Here is a Measure, not absolutely unanimously desired by the whole of Ireland, but desired by all parties in Ireland, by representatives and the great bulk of the members of both the two great religious communities into which Ireland, like other countries, is divided; politics do not enter into it, and it is a scandal that a Measure of so simple a kind should be put off year after year in this unsatisfactory way, this unworkmanlike way, put off upon an Expiring Laws Continuance Bill, and that the five exempted towns should be precluded from advantages which an enormous number of inhabitants of these towns fervently desire."

In the present Session the Home Secretary gave a very similar testimony. Speaking on the Debate on Sunday closing in England, he said:—

> "In Ireland, according to the report which has recently been made, and according to all the information I have, Sunday closing is a success."

Outside politics all the religious bodies in Ireland were in favour of it. The Bishops of the Church of Ireland were, he believed, unanimous on the subject. The great majority of the Roman Catholic Bishops were on the same side, and 17 of them had signed a petition in favour of this Bill, and it was also supported by the General Assembly of the Presbyterians and by the Methodist body. A memorial recently presented to Lord Cadogan asking the Government to support it was signed, among others, by 29 Bishops, by 993 magistrates, by 237 Town Commissioners and Poor Law Guardians, by 1,735 merchants and employers of labour. It can hardly indeed be disputed that the main features of the Bill are supported by an overwhelming preponderance of Irish opinion in all classes. ["Hear, hear!"] There was, in fact, no opposition to its general principle except from the trade. ["Hear, hear!"] He admitted that that was a very important exception, as the power of the publican vote was well known to every section of the House—[laughter]—and as the House would understand, there were conditions of parties when the support of that body was peculiarly desirable. While he said there was an immense consensus of opinion in favour of the Bill, he did not pretend to say that every detail of it was equally acceptable. The promoters of the Bill had simply embodied in it the recommendations of the Commission of 1888, and they brought forward the same Bill which had passed the House of Commons three times. He believed there was no real dispute in Ireland outside the trade about renewing the Act of 1878, and very little about Sunday closing at nine o'clock in the evening. The evils of Saturday night drinking had been attested by every judge of Irish life, and this part of the Measure was, in his opinion, even more important than Sunday closing. The spread of the Saturday half-holiday had rendered it easy for everyone to get what he wanted before nine o'clock. There were, however, special cases in which hardship might be caused by the change, and such cases the promoters of the Bill were quite prepared to meet. The cases of music-halls and theatres, Saturday entertainments in hotels and restaurants could all be considered in Committee. He believed there was no real opposition to the extension of the qualification for a bonâ fide traveller from three to six miles. He could not, however, claim the same substantial unanimity in favour of complete closing in the five towns. There had been a very considerable amount of independent opinion in favour of opening public-houses in these towns from two to five on Sunday instead of the present hours and instead of shutting them up altogether. Mr. Madden, who presided over the Committee of 1888, and who declared that the general principles of Sunday, and still more Saturday closing, was supported by "overwhelming majorities of all classes in Ireland" was in favour of this change. Several other competent judges supported him, and an Amendment to that effect was carried unanimously in the House of Lords in 1893. He was very much inclined to agree with it. He thought it was an Amendment which ought to be considered in Committee in a conciliatory spirit, and he believed most of his hon. Friends who supported the Bill were quite prepared to accept this alleviation. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not, however, think that the danger of shebeening or unlicensed drinking which had been put forward as an argument in favour of exempting the five large towns was a serious one. The Commission of 1888 reported that those evils had not arisen to any appreciable extent under the Act of 1878. Sir George Trevelyan, in the Debate on this Measure in 1891, said that when he was Chief Secretary he made a careful inquiry on the subject from the resident magistrates throughout Ireland, and that the overwhelming majority of them declared that the Act, as far as it had gone, had not led to shebeening. "There is absolutely overwhelming proof," he said, "that Sunday closing in Ireland has not led to an increase of shebeening." The case of Glasgow strongly confirms that view. Glasgow is a much larger city than any in Ireland, and it contains a very poor Irish population which is larger than the whole population of three of the exempted Irish towns. Yet this Sunday closing has proved a perfect success. In 1895, when some doubt was thrown on this fact, the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir C. Cameron) declared drunkenness had greatly diminished; that Sunday arrests had sunk to one-sixth of what they were on other days, and that no class, not even the publicans themselves, wished the public-houses to be open on Sundays. ["Hear, hear!"] This was the case he had to present to the House. He frankly confessed that he did not belong to the more advanced wing of the temperance party. His own view was that there should be as little legislative interference as possible with private habits, and he thought they ought never in these questions to precede public opinion, but only to follow it, and even lag a little behind it. ["Hear, hear!"] He believed Measures of this kind ought only to be carried when called for by a large and a persistent majority, and even then should be as far as possible tentative and gradual. It was because the Bill before the House seemed to him fully to meet these requirements that he had undertaken to bring it forward. One part of the Bill simply renewed a Measure which had been in operation successfully for no less than 19 years and which no one wished to repeal. The other parts of the Bill had been before the public since the Report of the Commission of 1888, and had been endorsed by a succession of large majorities in the House of Commons. Surely, then, it was time to bring this long controversy to an end, and, with whatever modification the House might think right, pass a Measure which in its main features was approved by an overwhelming majority of the people of Ireland of all classes, creeds, and sections of opinion, and which would be likely in the highest degree to benefit the social and moral condition of the country. [Cheers.]

*Mr. J. JORDAN (Fermanagh, S.) said he should endeavour to do what he could to second the Motion. He must say that he looked on this question as one which was in a somewhat abnormal condition. As already stated, this Bill had been supported by leading Members of the present Government. It was supported by two previous Governments. It had been endorsed by the recommendations of two Select Committees. It had been Read three times by overwhelming majorities, and passed with some modifications in the House of Lords. The majority of the people of Ireland were in favour of it, and particularly the supporters of the Government in that country. But notwithstanding all this, the House had been unable, or unwilling, to place the Bill permanently on the Statute Book. The case in favour of the Bill was so strong in 1878 that the House was compelled to pass the Measure for four years. After four years' trial the Bill was so far a success that it was included in the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill. Why, then, was it not made permanent? In his opinion it was because of the determined opposition of the English and Irish liquor trade. ["Hear, hear!"] It was a selfish opposition. ["Hear, hear!"] It was a social question, but there was an attempt to make it a political one. He refused to debate the question on that line. He was told that he was a precious Home Ruler trying to defeat the Irish by English and Scotch votes. He hoped those votes would never be devoted to a worse purpose. Had they not endeavoured to get Home Rule from the self-same votes? It was a very peculiar theory that these publicans had. They issued a Whip signed by two Irishmen only and four Englishmen. The publicans used the English vote when it suited them, and repudiated it when it did not suit them. For his part he would be glad to use English and Scotch votes in the interests of Irish remedial measures at all times. One would think that the publicans were about to be deprived of their whole trade. To the whole trade in Ireland that would only mean two hours of sale on a Saturday night. In the name of humanity surely the trade might forego the gains screwed out of poor wretches at the fag-end of a Saturday night. ["Hear, hear!"] The poor creatures—the publicans—had to be pitied. But what right had the publicans in these five towns to keep open on Sundays while the publicans in the rural districts had to close? Then they had the argument about liberty. Rank cant. Liberty to grow rich and enslave their assistants in the fumes of liquor for 17 to 18 hours a day, and for seven days a week, while the publican and the brewer were driving in their carriages. That was liberty. But the finest view was that the trade opposed this Bill in the interests of temperance. If they didn't keep open, the working man would take large quantities of drink to his home, and even his family would turn drunkards on Sunday! They kept their houses open on Sunday in the interests of humanity. He didn't believe it. On the contrary, he hoped the House would wipe out this scandal and pass this Bill by a large majority.

Mr. J. DALY (Monaghan, S.) proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." He said it was a pity that the duty of moving the rejection of the Bill was placed in his hands, but at the same time he depended on the goodness of the cause he advocated. They all listened with pleasure to the speeches which the hon. Member for Trinity College delivered in that House from time to time, but he would remind him that his speech here in endeavouring to take away the liberty and privileges of the people of Ireland was scarcely in harmony with his writings. As for the hon. Member for Fermanagh, he thought that, if the hon. Member believed in weak drinks, he used strong language. [Laughter.] He was as anxious to see Ireland temperate as anybody, but he did not believe that this was the right way to go about it. If this was to be good for Ireland it should be good for England also. The great Tory majority in the House of Commons was due to the influence of the publican, brewer, and distiller of England. This Measure would greatly injure the brewers and distillers of Ireland, but the promoters of the Measure had not taken into account the interests of that class of person, because they had no influence with the people and could not control votes. Had that class of trader any influence among the people of Ireland he was quite sure that some of the promoters of the Bill would not have brought in a Measure for coercing the people of Ireland, and not the people of England. The people in Ireland spent per head on intoxicating liquors £2 13s. per annum, while in England the sum was £4 2s., so that Ireland was comparatively a sober country as compared with England. If the public houses in Ireland were closed to-morrow there would be created a group of shebeens and bogus clubs that would take twice the number of constabulary they had to look after them, and he was surprised that any Nationalist Member who desired a reduction of the police force should think for a moment about giving his support to the Bill. He would, therefore, give this Measure his most strenuous opposition. Again, if this Bill were placed on the Statute Book, men who had been in the habit of visiting the public house on the Sunday evening would in all probability take drink to their homes, and if the House desired to do anything, it desired to avoid setting a bad example. But by passing this Bill men would take home liquor and drink it before their wives and children, and hence intemperance and demoralisation would be encouraged. ["Hear, hear!"] Archbishop Walsh was strongly opposed to the Bill, and had written stating that within the last few months the bogus club system had largely increased, and added that the evil was growing at a sufficiently rapid rate to cause alarm. He also stated that he was opposed to these so-called temperance Measures, which restricted the licensed trade, so long as the system of bogus clubs was allowed to continue. ["Hear, hear!"] He read extracts showing that the great bulk of police magistrates, resident magistrates, district inspectors, and the chief magistrate of Dublin was opposed to the Measure. Total Sunday closing prevailed in Cardiff, and a plebiscite was taken quite recently on the question, and out of a total vote of 11,127 only 2,574 voted in favour of maintaining Sunday closing. If men could not get drink legally they would get it illegally, and that would be a curse to Ireland, and there would be many shebeens springing up. He believed that this Bill was a direct blow at the publicans of Ireland. The vast majority of the publicans were Nationalists, and he was surprised that any Nationalist Member occupying a seat in that House should get up and advocate the taking away of the bread from the wives and children of those publicans. He would remind the House that there were very few cases of drunkenness in the five exempted towns on Sundays. He believed that for the whole year only 19 arrests took place in all those towns, and as these arrests took place from eight in the morning until eight o'clock on Monday morning, would any hon. Member say that they were not on account of the bad drink sold in the bogus clubs and the shebeens? He was as anxious to see the people of Ireland sober as any Member in that House, but he thought that bringing in such a Bill as this was putting the cart before the horse, and he hoped there would be such a majority against the Second Reading as would prevent the cranks and fanatics from ever bothering the House with this Measure again. He believed that every hon. Member who voted for him that day would be voting for the freedom of the people of Ireland and against the curtailment of their rights and privileges—which were already very much curtailed—without in any way interfering with the privileges of Englishmen.

*MAJOR JAMESON (Clare, W.), in seconding the rejection of the Bill, complimented the hon. Member for Trinity College on the moderation he had shown in moving the Bill. and said that if it were not that he believed the hon. Gentleman was entirely wrong in a great deal he had laid before the House, he would feel in voting against him, like a pagan about to plant an arrow in the breast of a mediæval saint. The hon. Gentleman had told the House that 34 bishops and deans were in favour of Sunday closing, but he omitted to give the religion of those bishops and deans. He believed there were 36 Catholic and 37 Protestant bishops and deans, so that, taking the 34 from the 73 there was a majority against the Sunday closing. He did not attach any importance to the argument that 34,000 houses were visited the occupants of which were in favour of the Bill, for they all knew how these bogus attempts of arriving at public opinion had worked. The hon. Member for Trinity College had told them that he was in favour of public houses being opened from two o'clock to five, but he thought the hon. Gentleman would agree that he had no right to state on what hours on Sunday the working classes desired to take refreshment. His first objection to the Bill was that he objected to any question affecting the vital interest of any trade in Ireland being dealt with by this House, or being decided by any tribunal than that of Irishmen in an Irish Assembly. Secondly, if it must be dealt with in this House, then the present moment, when a Royal Commission was sitting to consider and Report on the Licensing Laws, was not the proper moment for it to be brought forward. A Royal Commission had been ordered by the House to collect information for them, and therefore it would be both unfair to the House and also to the trade to adjudicate on the Bill that was placed before them. He objected altogether to a question of such magnitude being dealt with in a private Member's Bill, but he also objected to the Bill being brought before an English Parliament for the same reason that the late Charles Stewart Parnell spoke against any attempt at tampering with the Irish Licensing Question. The late Mr. Charles Stewart Parnell, in April 1891, when the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill was introduced, said:—

> "If the hon. Members do not wish to prejudice this question beforehand by their meddlesome interference and bungling attempts to legislate for the wants of people whom they cannot possibly understand, and in reference to a matter of which they are profoundly ignorant, then they will vote against the Second Reading of this Bill. If they believe that the time is near when Ireland will decide this question for herself—if they believe their own declarations—they will vote against this Bill, knowing that no time will be lost by leaving the consideration and settlement of this question to a Parliament which we hope to see established in Dublin."

He regretted to see the names of the hon. Member for Cork, the Member for Longford and the hon. Member for South Fermanagh on the back of the Bill, for the policy of Mr. Parnell in 1891 was right, and the policy of Mr. Parnell in 1891 was still right in 1897. It was not possible for this Bill to obtain such a position on the Order Papers of the House as would enable it to be fully, freely and fairly discussed, and nothing had occurred to offer a reasonable excuse for interfering in any way with a respectable class of traders who carried on their business under the licences which this Bill proposed to deal with. Did the promoters of the Bill contend that Ireland was a more drunken nation than England when they desired to legislate in such an exceptional manner? He was astonished that Irish Members, whether Tories or Home Rulers, could have been induced to put their names on the back of this Bill. Of course he excepted the Member for South Belfast; he was not at all surprised at seeing his name on the back of this Bill, as he believed he would condemn all Irishmen to drink lemonade, or to put it more appropriately, "orangeade," not only on Sunday, but every day of the week. [Laughter.] If the promoters of this Bill honestly thought that Ireland was a more drunken nation than England, if they honestly believed that this unseemly haste to legislate for their own country was of urgent necessity, of such importance that they could not even wait for the Report of the Royal Commission now sitting, let him assuage their fears and their thirst for legislation by pointing out that the Royal Commission on Financial Matters in Ireland proved beyond doubt that the expenditure on intoxicating liquor, per annum in Ireland was only £2 13s. per head as against £4 2s. per head in England. The requirements, habits and customs of the Irish people were so different from those either in Scotland or England, that it would be grossly unfair to legislate in this manner without the fullest inquiry, and without considering all the facts and circumstances of the case. This Bill proposed to arbitrarily interfere with a most deserving class of traders, and to brand Ireland with the stigma of intemperance, and to wholly ignore the wishes of the people of Ireland and the working classes of that country. He had before him the Reports of the evidence of the ex-resident magistrate for Belfast, Mr. McCarthy, and the Chief Police Commissioner, Mr. Singleton, who both stated that no change ought to take place in the Sunday hours of sale at present in force. He had also the leading opinions of the Archbishop of Dublin, the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary, Sir David Harold, the Under Secretary for Ireland, and several bishops and priests, well known as earnest and religious advisers of all subjects connected with the welfare of Ireland, and they one and all were absolutely adverse from a change in the law as regards Sunday closing, and they asserted that, far from furthering the cause of temperance, it would do exactly the contrary. He had also the evdence of Sir John Bridge, police magistrate of London; Colonel Moorsom, Chief Constable of Lancashire; Mr. Macenzie, Chief Constable of Cardiff; and Sir Henry Poland, Q.C., leading member and Alderman of the London County Council. Their evidence was given before the Royal Commission now sitting. He did not say there were no ways and Bills to be devised by which the Licensing Laws of this country could be improved, but this Bill was certainly not one of them. No doubt many Members had been in Paris on Sunday, and it must have surprised them to see how little drunkenness there was in that great city. With all the cafés and all the places of amusement open both day and night, there was less drunkenness there on Sunday than in any small Scotch or English town that could be named where Sunday closing was in force. He maintained that they had no right to prevent the working classes of Ireland from getting refreshment on Sunday, or to make their only day of rest unacceptable to them. Personally, he should like to see all the places of amusement and refreshment open after three o'clock on Sunday. It was a black, dreary Sunday that Sabbatarians desired to impose on the people of this country, and it was more conducive to intemperance than all the public houses of the United Kingdom. He should be glad to see the café system tried here. But what did they seek to do by this Bill? To impose upon a Roman Catholic country like Ireland the dreary and uninviting Sunday that had certainly not brought temperance to Protestant countries that had adopted it. He welcomed the idea that gave us military bands on Sundays in our parks, and he hoped to see refreshment kiosks erected by Government for the comfort of our working classes both here and in Ireland; and instead of penal laws being enacted and brought forward like this Bill, he desired to see the comfort and the amusement of the people more fully considered. He claimed to know something of the working classes of this country. He was for some considerable time Her Majesty's Inspector of Factories in the south-east of London and in the Black Country, and, if hon. Members really desired to promote temperance, let them do something to give the working classes amusement and comfort on their one day's rest from toil, to bring light and comfort into their homes. Let them do all they could for their education, instead of bringing forward these wretched penal enactments directed against a certain trade in this country, a trade that paid half of the taxation of the country. If this Government really wished to do something in the cause of temperance, let them do something for the education of Ireland, and pay the money they owed them towards that purpose; let them give the grant he asked for last year for the Christian Brothers' Schools, and allow them in Ireland to make their own local laws. This would do more for the cause of temperance than 50 Sunday Closing Bills. He asked the House, with confidence, to reject this Bill—a Bill drawn against the interests of a well-conducted class of traders and against the comfort of the public, to please the morbid prejudices of a reckless and fanatical minority.

Mr. J. A. RENTOUL (Down, E.) said the opposition to the Bill was a trade one from beginning to end, both in England and in Ireland. No proof had been given in support of the statement that the petitions in favour of the Bill were bogus petitions. This Bill had reached its majority this year. It was 21 years since this movement began; the Bill had passed the House three times; it had twice passed Select Committees with approval; it had passed the House of Lords, and it had received the approval of every Chief Secretary for the last 17 years. Now what explanation did the hon. Member who had just sat down give of this extraordinary fact? He said this House wished to put on record their belief that temperance was a good thing, and, having put that on record, like sensible men, they determined to proceed no further. Just let them apply that to Home Rule for Ireland. The hon. Member's first argument would apply word for word to that which he advocated so strongly, his intense adherence to the principle of Home Rule. The hon. Member's next statement was still more extraordinary. He said:—"The Mover of the Bill did not believe in his own Bill." That was cheap argument to put before the House. The hon. Member for Trinity College was successful in the ballot, but that fact did not compel him to bring in this Bill; but having before him numbers of other Measures, he felt nevertheless, that the very best thing he could do for his country was to bring forward this Bill. [Cheers.] Therefore, the reference of the hon. Member to the hon. Member for Trinity College was a very unfortunate one indeed. ["Hear, hear!"] It was said that this Measure should be adjudicated upon by an Irish Parliament. What would have been the fate of this Measure if it had been so adjudicated upon in the past? On every occasion when it had come before this House, it had been supported by a majority of Irish Members, and consequently, if its fate had been in the hands of an Irish Parliament, it would have been carried over and over again. [Cheers.] Of the names on the back of the Bill, one was that of the hon. Gentleman who was the Leader of almost the entire Irish Party for two or three years, until he resigned his post (Mr. Justin McCarthy), the one Irish Leader who was not kicked out; another was that of the hon. Member for Galway City (Mr. Pinkerton, a Nationalist); a third was "Ireland's only statesman" (Mr. Blake), a Gentleman who would be considered the most experienced by far of the Nationalist Members at the present time; and, lastly, he believed one of the hon. Members for Cork City (Mr. Maurice Healy) had come over specially for the purpose of voting in favour of the Bill. There was no city in Ireland that knew its own business better than Cork, and he did not believe that any Member for that city, whatever his private views on the Bill, would come over from Cork in defiance of the opinions of the city on the subject. Therefore the voice of Cork was practically unanimous for the Bill. He rather thought the hon. Member for South Monaghan was himself in the trade.

Mr. DALY: I am not in the trade. I hold no brief at all in the matter.

Mr. RENTOUL said he was glad the hon. Member had cleared his character at once. [Laughter.] It did him great credit. They heard a good deal in the last Parliament about agents provocateurs; now he considered that the publicans of Ireland were agents provocateurs—[cries of "Oh!"]—and that was the view of the majority of the Irish people also. [Cheers.] They felt that the public house was a temptation they had difficulty in withstanding, and they petitioned this House to take the temptation out of the way. [Cries of "Oh!"] The hon. Member for South Monaghan, who believed not in Acts of Parliament but in the clergy making the people sober, was, he thought, a Presbyterian.

Mr. DALY: I am not a Presbyterian. I am a Roman Catholic.

Mr. RENTOUL was pleased indeed to have that assurance. [Laughter.] Well, he understood that the Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church were, almost to a man, in favour of this Bill. [Cries of "No, no!"] Who were the Bishops of that Church who wanted the Bill rejected? Because no one could doubt that the clergy of any Church whatever wanted to see their people sober. ["Hear, hear!"] He believed the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church were in overwhelming numbers in favour of the Bill. Coming to the Presbyterian Church, he asserted that not only were the whole Presbyterian clergy in favour of it, but there was not a man who dared be anything else, unless he wanted to see himself out of ear with the entire of his congregation, and so lose every atom of power and influence with his people. [Cheers.] It was said that the Conservative majority in the present Parliament was due to the brewers and distillers; but he denied that altogether. Walthamstow was a constituency which he knew well, and he expected that the Government candidate would win the seat at the by-election by 2,000 votes, until he heard that he was a distiller, and then he knew that it would be lost. Hon. Members urged that to close the public-houses meant to open the clubs. But why should they be afraid of that? If the clubs increased the consumption of liquor it was better for the trade. But in any case surely Parliament could deal with the clubs. He was asked, "Would you deprive the poor man of his beer?" Yes, he would, if the poor man was spending one-sixth of his entire income on drink for himself. Recently two appeals had been made for Ireland on the ground of her poverty. As to the rating question, the amount spent on Sunday in the public-houses would do all that the Irish Members asked Parliament to do in that connection. And as to the question of rent, while the rental of Ireland was nine millions, the liquor bill was 12 millions. An hon. Member had said that Ireland was, comparatively with England, a teetotal country, because she drank only half as much as England in proportion to population. Yes, but Ireland had only one-tenth of the wealth of England, and therefore she was spending five times more than she ought to in proportion to her resources. [Cheers.] The opposition to the Bill was a trade opposition. A whip had been sent out signed by three or four members of the trade on the Ministerial side of the House; and that morning Members had been roused out of their beds at half-past Two by a telegram containing a wild appeal to vote against the Bill, and signed by a brewer and distiller who was lately a Member of the House. When hon. Gentlemen acted in this way they were degrading themselves and the trade to which they belonged. [Cheers.] If the trade was a good and legitimate trade, let it stand on its own legs. Other trades did not issue these appeals, and members belonging to them did not come down to the House to speak on their own behalf. ["Hear, hear!"] It was a degrading spectacle. One hon. Member had spoken of the enormous amount of the taxes of the country paid by the trade. It was not the trade that paid the taxes, but the clothes off the backs of the women of Ireland—[cheers] and the earnings of poor miserable wretches whose wives and children were starving. The two speeches which had been delivered from the other side were enough to sink the opposition to the Bill. He was sorry to see Members in the position of the hon. Member for the Harbour Division opposing this Bill; but he hoped that Irish Members generally would be true to their country's interests, and refuse to be tied to the heels of the trade. He hoped they would follow the lead of the clergy and Bishops on this question. [Cheers.]

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour) said the hon. Member for Dublin University twitted those who moved the rejection of the Bill with having no arguments in support of that Motion. He himself submitted that it lay upon those who proposed this Measure of exceptional legislation to give some argument for its adoption in Ireland so soon after the rejection by an overwhelming majority of a similar Bill for England. No argument of any weight or importance had been advanced in favour of the Bill. If the advocates of the Bill wished to suppress drinking, let them be impartial, and do so in the House of Commons, the clubs, and the private home circle. There was no evidence that drunkenness was on the increase in Ireland. The hon. Member for Dublin University himself denied that drunkenness was increasing there. In his well-known work, "Democracy and Liberty," he said:—

> "It must, in the first place, be noticed that the greatly increasing sensitiveness of public opinion on the question of drink is very far from implying that the evil itself is an increasing one."

There was strong reason to believe that the exact opposite was the case.

> "A hundred years ago," he added, "drunkenness was rather the rule than the exception among the upper class. But, with changed habits, and under the stress of public opinion, it has, in their section, almost disappeared. . . . . This vast change in the social life of the nation has not been effected by law or restriction, or even by religion, but by a simple change of habits, tastes, and ideals. No doubt a similar change has taken place, though not to so great an extent, among the poor. . . . The immense weight of the public-house vote and the teetotal vote in every part of the British Isles has placed the question in the very centre of the maelstrom of party politics."

*MR. LECKY, interposing, remarked that he had expressly said that Irish Sunday closing was not a Party question.

MR. HARRINGTON said he was contrasting the hon. Gentleman's speech in the House with what he had calmly written in the privacy of his study. The hon. Member for East Down had read them a homily on the cause of temperance. If it meant anything, it meant that drinking should be suppressed altogether. Let hon. Members and the upper classes of society set the example themselves, and then the restrictive legislation of the House would be received with more respect. This restrictive legislation was not to suppress drink, but was happily described by the hon. Member for Dublin University in "Democracy and Liberty" as "the result of a gust of genuine, but often ignorant fanaticism." The upper classes sought to impose on the poor restrictions as regards drinking which they would not submit to themselves. He himself had always been a rigid teetotaller. He had never known the taste of spirituous drinks. But he could never associate himself with the narrowness of spirit and bigotry which was at the bottom of all the temperance associations he knew. Their funds were wasted, not in making men sober, but in a vindictive warfare against men who differed from them in opinion. During the 12 years he had sat in the House, his policy had always been consistent. He was entirely in favour of the suppression of drunkenness, but there was no reason, common sense, or logic to place restrictions upon certain classes of society which were not imposed all round. If the present law for the suppression of drunkenness was not strong enough, let it be strengthened. A man could be punished for being drunk in the street, but the man who, by his drunkenness, ruined his home and made a hell of his own household went free. His wife, his children, his neighbours and others who suffered by his conduct should have the power to obtain protection against him. This Bill would not prevent drunkenness. To close public houses on Sundays would lead to an increase of drinking at clubs or shebeens, and in the home circle. Among other evils arising would be an enormous increase in shebeens and bogus clubs. A man of position need not drink in the presence of his children. But a poor man living in one or two rooms could not well prevent their noticing his bad example. There were safeguards connected with drinking in public houses which did not apply to it in clubs. Public houses were liable to be visited at any time by the police, and a publican was punished for allowing drunkenness on his premises. The club was not restricted as to hours of closing; it was free from inspection by the police, and money could be spent in clubs, not only in drink, but in every form of gambling. Dr. Macalister, Bishop of Down and Connor, said:—

> "I prefer to see the Act of 1878 renewed in the rural districts than the extension of total Sunday closing to large towns, where it is accompanied by shebeening and female drinking. Total Sunday closing is known to lead in large towns to illicit drinking and shebeening with their accompanying immoralities, and what is a greater evil beyond the power of the police or the law to correct—female drinking."

There was no evidence that such a Bill as this was necessary in Ireland. The consumption of drink had increased in Ireland, even in the five exempted cities. The average of arrests for drunkenness in the whole of the five cities was as low as 34. Most of the arrests were of persons who got drunk at bogus clubs and shebeens by 8 a.m. and 2 p.m. on Sundays, when the public houses were closed. As to the argument that four Irish Chief Secretaries had supported the principle of the Measure, that did not show that the people of Ireland were in favour. Irish Chief Secretaries knew very little of the country. He could not imagine a position which placed a man more completely out of touch with the country than the isolation of Dublin Castle. In the public house there was always the guarantee that the man who conducted it was respectable, that no person in drink would be served, and that the quality of the liquor was good. On the other hand, the men who ran the clubs which would be established if the Bill was passed, would be able to sell absolutely what they liked. The supporters of the Bill had not made an attempt to define their position. They had only given what they supposed to be a general description of the state of public opinion. So far from the majority of Irish Members being in favour of the Bill, as had been stated, he believed the Division would show the contrary. Reference had been made to a house-to-house canvass. No reliance could be placed on the evidence of opinion so obtained, unless it had been obtained by some properly constituted authority. Such evidence as had been obtained in that way could have no weight with rational men. How was a general demand on the part of the people for this Measure shown? There were men who had practically gone mad on this question of drink, and their mad enthusiasm ought to receive no sympathy in the House. If a case of an increase in drunkenness in Ireland had been made out, let it be dealt with; but if not, let not the House be deceived by general expressions of opinion into giving a vote which would deny to the poor man that which any member of society in a high social state enjoyed at his desire. ["Hear, hear!"] One of the provisions of the Bill was to extend Saturday closing. What would be the effect? Take the city of Dublin. At present it was the only city he knew in which a man coming off the sea at night could not get refreshment after 11 o'clock. It was now proposed to close earlier still, at 9 o'clock on Saturday night, and then a man coming off the sea would be precluded from getting refreshment after that hour. There was no reason for such a proposal, and those who were putting it forward were only doing so at the instigation of a genuine, perhaps, but ignorant fanaticism. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said that every day he was more and more convinced of the necessity for this Bill, and of its application to Ireland. Year after year Irish Members had declared in favour of the Bill, over and over again respectable Irish society had demanded it, and though the supporters of the Bill had sometimes had a successful Division on a Wednesday, they could get no nearer the object of their desires. That state of things was little less than a public scandal. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill was denounced as an attack on the liberties of the people and the interests of a great trade. What did it do? Over the bulk of Ireland public houses were open for 16 hours a day, or 96 hours a week. This Bill sought to take off one hour in the week. ["Hear, hear!"] In the five large towns public houses were open 17 hours a day, or 107 hours a week, and the proposal of the Bill was to cut off the odd seven. He could not see how that could be described as a monstrous invasion of liberty. ["Hear, hear!"] He held that the Irish people were a great deal better in every way than the English, and he declined to accept what the Englishmen did as at all a standard in this matter; and whether Irishmen drank as much intoxicating liquor as Englishmen or not, they drank a great deal more than they required; whether their drink bill was as large, relatively speaking, as the English drink bill, it had certainly attained proportions which constituted a gross scandal. But after all, the drink consumed in Ireland was consumed by a relatively small number of persons. The average population was exceedingly temperate. The Irish peasant spent very little on whisky or other intoxicating liquors. He lived a sober, abstemious life, and in that respect he could be well compared with the peasant of France or of any other country. Drinking in Ireland was necessarily concentrated in the large centres of population, and if the drink bill was regarded from that point of view it impressed the mind much more than it did when put forward in another way. His hon. Friend the Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin said the supporters of the Bill had advanced no argument in its support. The hon. Member for Trinity College very truly said that the time for argument had long passed. Twenty years ago they argued this question out; but he would present one argument in support of the Bill. It was that they commended the Bill to the House as an experiment which had already been tried in Ireland, and which had succeeded. Sunday closing had been in force in the rural districts of Ireland for 20 years, and was there any man in his senses who would move the repeal of the Act? No one would for a moment dream of suggesting such a reversion to barbarism as that would be. They were told that there would be shebeening and illicit trade in unlicensed houses, as well as in public houses themselves. Of course there would be shebeening and illicit trade, but it would not attain the horrible proportions they had heard described to-day. There was nothing sacred about the public house as some hon. Members would have them suppose. His hon. Friend the Member for South Dublin seemed to think that the public house was an institution set up for the moral and intellectual improvement of the Irish people—he did not know what depth of degradation and misery they would reach if they had not this self-sacrificing and heroic trade thrusting itself into the gap and standing between the country and demoralisation. But they were not such sucking babes as to accept as gospel language of that kind. A large and discreditable amount of drunkenness took place in Ireland, as in England, and what he desired to ask was where that drunkenness was caused? Was it not as plain as the light of day that that drunkenness was due to the public house, and the public house alone? What was asked was that some small check should be put upon those houses, that the State should step in between the drunkard and tempter. Much was said about liberty and the privileges of the people. The artisan of the great cities finished work at one or two o'clock on Saturday. Surely between two and nine o'clock on Saturday was quite long enough for the most zealous worshipper of Bacchus to spend in the public house. Surely after nine o'clock the wife and children might get a chance. Liberty was a good thing, and coercion was a bad thing, but let them think a little of the wretched wives and hungry children. No decent artisan or labourer could greatly complain if the State stepped in and said, "At nine o'clock on Saturday night you may go home and spend the remainder of the evening with your wife and family." When the question of Sunday closing was originally proposed, Irish publicans themselves said, "Oh, it is not the Sunday, but the Saturday night drinking which does the harm." The promoters of the Bill had adopted the publicans' views, and were denounced as if they were doing something unheard of. He did not believe one bit in the argument about shebeening. That was an argument which, if good at all, was good against all restrictions on the sale of drink. They heard a great deal about bogus clubs, and he supposed such clubs were an evil which would have to be met. But bogus clubs had been successfully dealt with in Dublin. He thought that the gentlemen who resorted to clubs in London and elsewhere might very well make a self-denying ordinance and subject themselves to the same restrictions as applied to public houses. Of all the cant which was talked on this question of temperance this cant about the rich man's club was the worst. Was it in clubs that they saw men drunk, or hanging round their doors the ragged forms of women and hungry children? What hypocrisy it was! Clubs were kept decent for the sake of the gentlemen who frequented them, and therefore he did not think that there was any substance in the complaint as to the clubs. Here, however, a great trade organisation was banded and leagued against this Sunday closing reform; and if he had to make a choice between tolerating the existing state of things, with all the scandals and evils which resulted from it, and doing in the process some injury to the publican, he said that the personal interests of the publican or his trade could not be allowed to stand between society and its advancement in civilisation, in decency and in comfort. He believed that the fierce opposition offered to the Bill was the best testimony to the good that it would effect if passed into law. He trusted that, regardless of trade interests, and as to how this reform might influence any individual, the House would now do something to advance the social improvement of the country.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I rise, not to deal with the general question of temperance legislation, or even with the specific merits or demerits of the Bill now before us, but to make a short statement in the nature rather of personal explanation than of discussion upon the legislation with which we are concerned. As the House is aware, there is at the present moment a Commission sitting, appointed by the Government, which has committed to it the onerous duty of surveying the whole field of liquor legislation, and making recommendations to Parliament on the subject. We have taken up the line that until that Commission has reported, we ought not to be asked to take any practical steps one way or the other to deal with the thorny problems of liquor legislation. [Cheers.] I have no doubt that the policy which has guided the Government in other analogous questions in the course of the present Session, is one which my colleagues will as a rule take for their guidance on this occasion; but I propose to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, and so far to depart from that line of action. My own connection with this particular project of legislation is somewhat different from that of other Gentlemen, official or unofficial, who have given previous votes upon it. In 1888, while I was Chief Secretary, a Committee was appointed to thrash out the whole subject. The Chairman of that Committee was the then Attorney General for Ireland, now Mr. Justice Madden—a man with whom it was a great pleasure and honour for me to act, and whose memory, I am sure, is still kept green in all parts of the House. ["Hear, hear!"] He presided over the labours of that Committee. Witnesses were examined representing every section of society in Ireland, brought from every political party, representing every conceivable interest. I was not a member of the Committee myself, and in a sense, therefore, my information as to its proceedings must be regarded as information derived at second hand. But I had long and anxious conversations with Mr. Madden on the subject, and he told me that in his view there was something aproaching absolute unanimity of public opinion in Ireland in favour of this legislation. [Cheers.] Of course, the public opinion in Ireland was not the uninformed public opinion anxious to try a new experiment about which it may have very little information; it was a public opinion which had been educated by some years' experience of precisely analogous legislation extending over the greater part of the country. As the House is aware, this Bill, so far as Sunday closing is concerned, is in actual force over the whole of Ireland, except in the five exempted towns. Mr. Madden went into the question absolutely without prejudice, and he came to the conclusion that, though the Bill in its form of requiring Sunday closing in the large towns the whole of Sunday was too extreme a measure—though he was in favour of the Amendment to which my hon. Friend the Member for Trinity College has given his adhesion—yet he was of opinion—and the Irish Government of his day were of opinion, and the general Government of the country, following the Irish Government, were of opinion—that that Bill was one which might well pass into law with the Amendments which seemed to be necessary. Everyone knows that the fact of this Bill passing its Second Reading to-day will not on that account secure its passing into law during the present Session. A Wednesday Bill, whatever be its fate in the Division Lobbies, if it is not brought on until the middle of May, has no earthly chance of becoming law in the course of the present Session. The question I have to decide for myself is whether I should accept the general position taken up that legislation should be deferred until the Commission Report, or whether I should not, on the other hand, give again a vote in favour of this Bill. No arguments have been brought to my knowledge which alter the view which the Irish Government when I was Chief Secretary arrived at nine years ago. It is possible that the division among gentlemen representing Ireland may show a larger proportion of Irish opinion against the Bill than existed before. I gather that was the view of the hon. Member for the Harbour Division of Dublin; but previous Divisions on this subject, as well as the results of the Committee, have shown that Irish opinion, broadly speaking, is strongly in favour of the Bill. [Cheers.] Irish opinion, whether the opinion of Nationalists, or Unionists, priests, parsons, ministers, constabulary, or Fenians, is all unanimous, broadly speaking, in favour of this Measure. [Cheers.] The country districts in Ireland which are under this legislation are not suffering under slavery. ["Hear, hear!"] We in Scotland, who have had Sunday closing, are not suffering under slavery; and, though I am not an advocate of Sunday closing in England, I cannot admit that where it has already been in operation it can be regarded as an unjustifiable interference with the liberty of the subject. Nor, as far as I am able to judge, can it be described as a serious interference with any trade or profession whatever. Under these circumstances, I propose to support again in the Lobby the opinions which, officially and unofficially, I have supported for nine years, and until evidence is brought before me, either by Debates in this House or by the labours of the Commission, that public opinion has changed in Ireland, or that circumstances in Ireland are such that this Measure will not produce the beneficial effects which Irishmen of all shades of opinion anticipate from it, I do not think I should be acting the part of a consistent politician if I made any change in the course I propose to take.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): Perhaps I may be allowed to intervene in this Debate for a moment or two, and to say with how much satisfaction I have listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, both for the conclusion at which he has arrived and for the grounds on which he based that conclusion. I understood him to say that some of his colleagues were inclined to vote against this Bill on the ground that the subject-matter of it is under the consideration of Lord Peel's Commission. I did not understand the right hon. Gentleman to accept that position himself.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I do accept it as a sound reason for taking the course the right hon. Gentleman objects to, although in my special circumstances and in my historic connection with this Bill, I do not propose to take it myself.

MR. J. MORLEY: That may be so, but the right hon. Gentleman does not himself think that reason sufficient in his own case. It must be remembered that, before the Committee to which the First Lord of the Treasury has referred, the whole subject was most carefully gone into, and it is not conceivable that Lord Peel's Commission can come upon one single new fact, or can find one single argument bearing on the state of Ireland, which can in the least degree affect the vote which any hon. Gentleman in this House ought to give. It was my good fortune practically to follow the right hon. Gentleman in being responsible for Irish affairs, and I think twice it came before our Government to say whether this Bill should or should not be supported; and, exactly for the reasons the right hon. Gentleman opposite has just given, it seems to me it is impossible for anybody, Unionist or Nationalist, to oppose a proposal which has been in actual working over all Ireland except the five exempted towns, and which is undoubtedly, whatever may be the balance of opinion at this moment in this House, the desire of all large organised bodies of opinion in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman referred to Scotland. When I was Chief Secretary, and this subject excited a good deal of attention in the House—partly because it is thought to bear on a similar question affecting England—I made it my business to send over one of our most experienced police officers to Glasgow, where there is a very large Irish population. This experienced officer's conclusion was that the success of the Sunday Closing Act in Glasgow, and not least among the Irish population of Glasgow, had been all that the best friends of that legislation could desire, and that he for his own part was persuaded that the extension of the Act to a city like Belfast, and, I am afraid I must say, still more like Dublin, would produce the most beneficial results, against which there was no practical set-off whatever. I also took measures at that time to find out how the Irish population of New York bore the Sunday Closing Act there; but at that moment, in 1895, there were so many differences and disputes as to the working of the Act in New York that it proved no useful lesson. But the Glasgow evidence was perfectly conclusive so far as it went, and I think it ought to go a very considerable way in inducing hon. Gentlemen in this House to give their vote for this Bill. I, for the same reason as the First Lord of the Treasury, have no hesitation whatever in again voting for the Second Reading of this Bill, and I cannot understand why the sitting of the Peel Commission should be taken as constituting a disability to the judging of this question. I hope that even now some hon. Gentlemen who are thinking of what I may call riding off on Lord Peel's Commission will reconsider the matter, and will assent to a Bill which is undoubtedly required by the great body of public opinion in Ireland.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford) said that what struck him in listening to the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury was that he failed altogether to show why the Government should take up one attitude with reference to an English Sunday Closing Bill on the 10th of February, and an entirely different attitude with reference to the Irish Sunday Closing Bill that day. He understood from the right hon. Gentleman's speech that it was the intention of the Government to take no part as a Government in this matter, but that the various members of the Administration would be permitted to vote as they pleased; but on the 10th of February, when a similar proposal was before the House with regard to England, the Leader of the House and the Home Secretary, the official Whips of the Party, and all the leading Members of the Party, voted against the Bill, on the ground, as stated by the Home Secretary, that a Commission had been appointed to inquire into the whole question of the liquor traffic, and that this was one essential portion of the question. Did the Leader of the House seriously contend that it was a wise or just thing to endeavour, by English, Scotch, and Welsh votes, to force upon Ireland a Bill of this character when he refused to pass a similar Bill for England?

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: The hon. Gentleman's name was on the back of this Bill for ten years.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND said that, if the hon. Gentleman who had interrupted him had had patience to wait until he came to the consideration of the merits of the Bill, he would have found that that observation was quite irrelevant. He entirely and absolutely sympathised with the objects of those who were promoting this Bill. The object of the promoters was to further temperance in Ireland; and, while he thought that, on every occasion of that kind, Irish Members ought to take the opportunity of protesting against the prevalent idea in this country that Ireland was, by comparison with England, a drunken country, which was one of the calumnies current in this country; at the same time no man who was at all acquainted with Ireland could deny that drink in that country was a very serious and grave evil—that a great deal of the poverty and of the industrial paralysis, and almost all the crime in Ireland—was directly due to drink. Under these circumstances he would indeed be a poor patriot, and a very shallow politician, and a very shortsighted reformer, who would sit with his hands folded and make no effort whatever to deal with them. He would go further than that and say, he was in favour of moderate and well-considered legislation directed to the object the promoters had in view so long as that legislation fulfilled these two conditions—that it did not unduly interfere with the general convenience and rights of the community, and that the legislation was of such a character as to lead one to suppose that it was likely, in some degree at any rate, to remove the evil which existed. With Sunday Closing as it existed in Ireland at that moment he was in hearty accord. He did not think there was much difference of opinion as to Sunday Closing in the rural districts. At the time he was one of its most strenuous supporters, and he took leave to say that none of those who bitterly opposed it in those days would venture to come forward with a Bill for its repeal. He thought total Sunday closing as it existed in Ireland in the country districts had proved a moderate success. He did not believe it had at all answered the sanguine anticipations of those who advocated it at the time, but still he believed that the balance had been on the right side, and that its working had been in the direction of good. No doubt, while it had not answered the expectations of its supporters, it was true to say that in some cases it had worked oppressively, and in the law as it now stood there were, in his opinion, certain defects. For example, he thought nothing could be more ludicrous than the present bonâ fide traveller clause. There were provisions of that kind in the existing law, as applied to country parts, which should be amended, but as applied to the country parts it had been fairly satisfactory, and he knew no large body of opinion in Ireland in favour of its repeal. So far with regard to the country districts. This Bill did not propose to alter that in the slightest degree, but in the large cities of Ireland the case had been different. In the five large cities the law was that the public-houses were open from two till seven; and the present proposal was that they should be closed for the entire day. He always had been a pronounced supporter of the principle of Sunday Closing, but he was not prepared to say that the application of that principle should be the same in different classes of communities, and he was not clear that it would be practical or wise to have absolute closing for the whole of Sunday in these large cities. He did not know whether the present hours were too long. Possibly a strong case might be made out in that direction, but he submitted that if the case for shortening these hours by one hour or more was to be made out it should be made out before the Royal Commission which was now sitting, and this Bill should be postponed until that Commission had reported. His own individual view was that total Sunday closing in great communities was impracticable, unworkable, and unwise. As to whether the present hours were too long, that was a thing he would not venture to express an opinion upon in view of the action of the English and Scotch Members. Until the Commission had reported it would be a monstrous thing if they were by their votes to force total Sunday closing on Ireland while the same Commission was about to report on it. It seemed to him that the difficulties of carrying out total Sunday closing in these big cities were enormous, the necessary inconvenience to the public so great, and the dangers arising from the formation of bogus clubs and institutions of that kind were so formidable, that it would be an unwise thing to force the Second Reading of this Bill pending the decision of the Royal Commission. The law as it stood at the present moment, notwithstanding certain defects he had mentioned, was fairly satisfactory. Why could not it be allowed to continue for the next year until this Commission had reported. There was only one other observation he desired to make on this matter. He took his stand on the position taken in the House by Mr. Parnell in 1888. On this question, as no doubt on every Irish question that had cropped up since his death, or was likely to crop up in their lifetime, Mr. Parnell's words could be wisely taken as a guide for Irish Nationalist Members to follow. Everyone who knew Mr. Parnell knew he was a strenuous advocate of temperance legislation, quite as strong as the hon. Gentleman who moved this Bill. He, at the commencement of this controversy, voted repeatedly in favour of this Bill. He himself did also, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork had reminded him. But in the year 1888 Mr. Parnell, speaking on this subject, laid it down that this was a matter which clearly should be decided by Irish public opinion. The right hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for Montrose, spoke as if Irish public opinion was unanimous in favour of this Bill. On the merits of Sunday closing, probably there was a strong feeling of a large majority of the people in favour of it, but on the question of the passing of this Bill in its present shape at this moment, pending the sitting of the Royal Commission, he ventured to assert there was no such unanimity; but, on the contrary, a majority the other way. He thought it would be found by the House that a considerable majority of the Irish Members in the coming Division would be found voting against the Second Reading; and he asked again, were Englishmen, having refused to accept a similar Bill for themselves, going to force it on the majority of the Irish representatives to-day? Mr. Parnell took the position that this was a matter that should be decided by Irish public opinion. He said:—

> "It matters not what system you leave the superintendence, management, and direction of this Question to in the future, whether to county boards, or the larger system of autonomy proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Mid-Lothian. In the hands of such bodies, and under either system, the Question is safe. I believe Irishmen, acting at home, discussing this Question amongst themselves, free from your interference, will decide this Question more advantageously and justly than you can here, and their decision will be attended by much happier and better results for the people. The Question is one which is most intimately connected with the question of self-government."

That was the ground on which he took his stand. He said—leave this to a vote of the Irish Members and let the Irish Members of all sections record their votes. If the majority was in favour of the Bill well and good, but would English Home Rulers, in face of the majority of the Irish Members against the Bill, force the Second Reading of it, when the House of Commons refused, by a large majority, in the case of a similar Bill for England, to do so? He pressed on English, Scotch, and Welsh Members the desirability of letting the Irish Members decide this for themselves, and he impressed on all Irish Members the desirability of taking their stand on the sound and sure National ground laid down by Mr. Parnell in 1888.

SIR J. HASLETT (Belfast, N.) said that, as the representative of one of the largest industrial centres in Ireland, he should give his unqualified support to the Bill. He had listened with great interest to the remarks of the previous speaker whose argument, if it was worth anything, amounted to this: "The Bill is a good Bill; it was formerly a child of my own; I formerly took a great interest in its favour; but in view of the strong remarks of the late Mr. Parnell, I believe the Bill should not be passed at present;" and he gave two reasons for that. First, there was a Commission now sitting; and, second, that in the distance Home Rule would be carried; and that, therefore, the Bill would be carried under a Home Rule Government. He was afraid that if Ireland was to be dealt with in that way, they had not listened carefully to her more potent demands made very recently. He knew as much of the city of Belfast as anyone could be expected to do who had lived in it all his life, mixed with its industrial population from his boyhood, been one of the drudges in life, one who had worked his 16 or 17 hours a day, and knew what compulsory labour was to that extent, and who had a feeling in connection with industrial pursuits that Parliament should protect them against inordinate hours, whether for the buyer or the seller. They had curtailed the hours in almost every pursuit in life. By the ringing of the bell they compelled the silence of the engine, the loom, and the shuttle, but the pursuit they were now dealing with they left untouched, and practically admitted amongst them slavery of the deepest and darkest kind to a very large number, not only of employers, but employed. It might be said that Sunday closing or Sunday opening was a voluntary act, that a publican was not obliged to open his public house. But anybody in business knew how fallacious that argument was. A publican's customers would tell him, "If you do not give me my drink on Sunday you shall not give it me on Monday." Therefore he must open his public house if his neighbours kept open. He had among some of his most esteemed friends men in the liquor traffic in Belfast, and he knew that a considerable proportion of them would welcome the Bill as relieving them of the necessity of opening, and as protecting them against the competition of their neighbours. There were three or four principles which appeared to operate in the minds of hon. Members who opposed the Bill, with which he would try to deal. The first was bogus clubs. He did not know that they could ever do away with bogus clubs until they did away with drinkers altogether. He did not know what was meant by bogus clubs unless it was a hairdresser's, where they could get a shave nominally for a penny and had fourpence added to the shave for a wash and grog. There were innumerable ways in which a drinking man could get drink, and he did not suppose they would be able to stop it. But bogus clubs had not prospered in Belfast. It might be said that the reason was that they had Sunday opening. But the hardest time of all for a drinking man was in the morning; if he could do until Two o'clock in the day without a drink, he could do without it all day, but he wanted a hair of the dog that bit him very early indeed, lest hydrophobia should set in. As to the argument that Sunday closing would lead to drinking at home, he felt that, unless a man was lost to all feelings of decency, the presence of his children would deter him from drinking. He believed in the Irish character, because they drank less at a time. In England they were not in it with Ireland. [Laughter.] He sometimes did go into a public house. [Laughter, cries of "Oh!" and a NATIONALIST MEMBER: "What for?"] Just by way of observation. [Renewed laughter.] He was astonished to find an hon. Member opposing the Bill who was a total abstainer. He was himself a life-long abstainer, never having tasted drink in his life. All his life long he had been trying to lift upwards those who were so deeply sunk—["hear, hear!"]—and if this Bill would do anything, he gave it his support on the highest grounds. In England they were selfish in this matter. They would drink their two pots of beer, and each man would pay for his own. Such a thing in Ireland would put a man out of society. What, then, would an Irishman do. He would go half way up and down the street till he met some chum who would go in and have a drink. [Laughter.] He would not go in by himself, but if he had a chum they would have two pots, and if there were four chums they would have four pots. [Laughter.] It was the social element which entered into this question in Ireland. Chums did not go into each other's houses to drink in Ireland. If they did, as a rule the thrifty wife would welcome Jones's company by trying to give him a cup of tea or something of that sort. ["Hear, hear!"] There was another argument which had been presented to them. He was not going to use any strong words about the trade. God knows what any of them might have been if they had been raised in the trade themselves. [Laughter.] He said that frankly and freely. He was a druggist himself, and there was nothing like taking plenty of drugs. But unfortunately people did not understand that, and they only came to him in their last resource. It might be said that the publican was his best friend. He did his best to break a man down, and then that man came to him (Sir James) to set him up again. He saw in the petition which had been circulated, it was stated that the clergy were in favour of opening on Sundays. That was a bold statement. They were told in the petition that 20,000 names had been got in Belfast against the Bill, and amongst the names he found that of Mr. T. W. Russell. [Loud laughter.] He was only trying to show the value of these petitions, and he would content himself by saying that if this one was signed in the public houses there they might expect to find a strong opinion on the subject. ["Hear, hear!"] He was especially interested in the Saturday night question. In Belfast the chief number of arrests was made on Saturday night, and Saturday night drinking was opposed to the highest interests of the working man, as well as to his health and strength. The day of rest was never given to the toiling men that it might be used for sleeping off the debauchery of the previous day. The recognised courts of the Presbyterian Church in Belfast supported the Bill, and they represented more than 17,000 families. The Wesleyans, who represented no inconsiderable portion of the population, this week declared unanimously in favour of a Sunday Closing Act, and the Episcopalians and Roman Catholics took the same view. For the sake of the families of the working men, and for the sake of the principles of humanity, which should be dear to all of them, he beseeched the House not to be led away by the argument that this Bill was an interference with individual liberty, but to take away the temptation to trample under foot God's day of rest.

SIR THOMAS LEA claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.—Debate resumed.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.), said that, as a member of the Licensing Commission, he felt he ought to keep an open mind until the Inquiry was concluded. He suggested to the House that no legislation of this kind should be passed until the Commission had reported, when a comprehensive Measure dealing with the licensing laws could be passed. The present Bill was, after all, nothing but a piecemeal attempt to deal with a part of the question. Ireland had the right to the same treatment as England in this matter. He strongly objected to the extremists and faddists who thrust their opinions upon others with intolerable tyranny. The arguments of the hon. Member who last spoke were really directed to a total abolition of the drink traffic.

*MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) said that the Bill affected two interests. The rural publicans were affected by the early closing on Saturday night, and the publicans in the big towns were affected by the Sunday closing. It was in the interests of the former that he should speak. As to the arguments derived from the evils of the drink traffic, they would be more properly directed to a Bill for the total abolition of the traffic than to the Measure before the House. Many of the speakers had held up the publican as a sort of vulture preying upon society, whose extirpation should be the first work of Parliament; but really the whole question was one of free-will. The publican did not drag men into his house; his customers went there of their own accord. Of course those who opposed this Bill were subjected to all sorts of misrepresentation; and there had been much virtuous declamation on the part of the promoters of the Bill against the heinousness of any Member daring to defend the trade in which he was in any degree interested. But what had the lawyers done on the previous evening, when one of their grievances was before the House? They saw the lawyers of all sides and parties gather in self defence and support the Motion before it. Much had been said too about the issuing of whips by the opponents of this Bill, as though it were not the constant and legitimate practice of those interested in any question to issue Whips when a division was to be taken by the House. When had there been any Bill affecting lawyers, doctors, engineers, or any trade or interest that the persons affected had not canvassed the House? At present, in all Irish towns below 6,000 in population, the public houses were open from 7 in the morning to 10 at night; and it should be remembered that in Ireland every publican was a grocer. His experience was that for five days in the week those hours were too long. He said that, not from a temperance point of view, but because the trade in the Irish towns was declining. The one day in the week on which the publican had any business to do in the rural districts of Ireland was Saturday. His customers were the farmers and labourers. The farmers came into town early and left early; and he repudiated the charge of heavy drinking which had been brought against them. The habit had very sensibly declined. But the labourers of Ireland could not get away from their work until the end of the day. There was no Saturday half-holiday for Irish labourers. Their employers were generally men who took twelve long hours of toil out of them whether the day was Monday or Saturday. Then when his day's work was done, perhaps, the labourer had to go two or three miles to the nearest town to do his marketing, and to compel the closing of public-houses at nine o'clock, and thus prevent the man from getting the necessaries of life, was an entire invasion of the liberty and right which he enjoyed under the existing law. He absolutely denied the statement that public opinion in Ireland was unanimous in favour of the Bill. No public meeting had ever been held in Ireland in favour of the Bill; at no election in Ireland had this question been made a test question. The Mover of the Second Reading of the Bill had stated that one thousand clergy were in favour of its principles. As there were 5,000 clergy of all denominations in Ireland, one thousand was not a preponderating number in favour of the principles of the Bill. This was a most important question, and deserved more serious consideration than could be given to it in a few hours on a Wednesday afternoon. The Government had appointed a Royal Commission to report to the House what steps should be taken to regulate the whole traffic in drink. Therefore, the position taken up by the First Lord of the Treasury, in supporting the Bill, was most inconsistent, and the hon. Member for Waterford was well entitled to complain that in all these matters one line was taken in regard to England and another and a totally different line was taken in regard to Ireland.

Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.—Debate resumed.

Mr. JOHN WILSON (Govan) supported the Bill. He came from a country where Sunday closing had been in operation for 50 years, and the results had been so satisfactory that no hon. Member from Scotland would, in the interests of his constituents, ask that it should be repealed or abrogated in any way. ["Hear, hear!"] When the Sunday Closing Bill for Scotland was before the House it was said—as it was said now in regard to Ireland—that it would lead to a disturbance of the public peace. The result in Scotland was the very reverse. ["Hear, hear!"] The Sunday in Scotland was a quiet, peaceable day; whereas formerly, when the public-houses were opened, there was a great deal of drunkenness and immorality. ["Hear, hear!"] He hoped, therefore, that the result of the division would be in favour of the establishment of Sunday closing in Ireland.

Mr. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.) said he was surprised that a Scotch Home Ruler like his Friend the Member for Govan should have taken part in the Debate at all. [Laughter.] His hon. Friend believed that Ireland should have control of her own affairs; therefore, his interference was a contradiction of his principles. [Laughter.] He ventured to assert, in reply to his hon. Friend's remarks on the effect of Sunday closing in Scotland, that there was less drunkenness and more virtue in the city of Dublin or in any part of Ireland than in any city in Scotland, with all its Sunday closing. [Cries of "No, no!"] He was astonished that the Bill should have been introduced by the hon. Member for Dublin University. The hon. Gentleman must have forgotten some of his arguments in his latest book, "Democracy and Liberty." In that book, referring to the proposal for the total or partial prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors, by local option or by general enactment, he said it was an argument for preventing all men from using drink because some used it to excess. The hon. Gentleman then went on to say that such coercion must not be confounded with that which was sometimes found necessary in industrial life for the purposes of carrying out the wishes of a majority. If the great majority of shopkeepers desired to shut their shops on a particular day, or if the great majority of workmen wished to leave the factory at a particular hour, they might plausibly argue that the rule should be made universal, as a minority pursuing a different course would frustrate their desires. But, he said, the man who wished to go to a public house did not in any way interfere with the liberty of those who desired to abstain. [Laughter.] In practice, too, the restriction was a measure of extreme partiality. ["Hear, hear!"] The rich man had his private cellar and his club, whereas the poor man had not. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. LECKY said that in the passage quoted he was speaking of local option, and not of Sunday closing, and the hon. Member would find that two pages further on he had said that in his opinion public opinion both in Ireland and in Scotland was unquestionably in favour of Sunday closing.

Mr. CLANCY said the words "partial or total prohibition" occurred. Moreover, this passage was founded upon an assumption which the hon. Gentleman took for granted—namely, that the majority of the Irish people were in favour of such legislation as this. That was not the case. The hon. Member for Trinity College had recently defended the right of the landlords to compensation, but now he proposed to take away the income of the publicans without offering them any compensation. To his mind this would be an act of pure confiscation, and he hoped that English Home Rulers would not go into the Lobby in favour of this Bill when they knew that the majority of the Irish Members did not approve of it.

Colonel SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) thought it was a mistake to say that the majority of the Irish Members would be found voting against this Bill. This was a question between whisky-makers and publicans on the one side, and the great majority of the Irish people on the other. [Cheers and cries of "No!"] He represented a constituency mainly composed of working men, and he did not know of any question which had come recently before the House which had had such unanimous approval from his constituents. He had had many letters and petitions in favour of the Bill, and he believed that if the constituencies were polled a great majority of the Irish people would be found to be in its favour. It had been tried in Scotland, and had been eminently successful in Glasgow. [Laughter and cries of "No!"] It had been successful at any rate so far as the Irish population of Glasgow was concerned—the Scotch population, he believed, were perfectly incorrigible in the direction of whisky. [Laughter.] He believed the overwhelming opinion of all ministers and religious denominations in Ireland was in favour of this Bill, which would put down what had been found to be an intolerable nuisance and evil in Ireland, and he hoped the Government would see that it had a fair chance of passing into law this Session.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny), in opposing the Bill, urged that, in order to be consistent, the Government should at least wait until they had further information on the subject before they legislated. That would be following the course they had adopted in regard to the question of the financial relations. Let them put their own House in order before legislating for Ireland on this matter. That House was either a shebeen or a bogus club. Hon. Gentlemen did not practise what they preached, for of the ten Gentlemen whose names were on the back of the Bill, five, at least, did not practise abstention from intoxicants. He should vote for the rejection of the Bill, but if it passed the Second Reading, they would oppose it at every stage.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION BILL.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of ONSLOW) moved the Second Reading of the East India Company's Officers' Superannuation Bill, the object of which is to set at rest certain doubts which have arisen as to the powers of the Secretary of State with regard to officers who were originally upon the establishment of the East India Company, and have now, under the Act of Parliament, been transferred to the control of the Secretary of State for India in Council. There were, he said, only 12 of them still in the service.

Read 2ª (according to Order); and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

REGULAR AND ELDERS' WIDOWS' FUNDS BILL.

*THE EARL OF ONSLOW, in moving the Second Reading of the Regular and Elders' Widows' Funds Bill, said this, again, was a Bill to set at rest certain legal doubts respecting the vesting in the Secretary of State the surplus funds belonging to this institution. By actuarial calculation it had been discovered that the assets were considerably in excess of the liabilities, and as the object of the fund would in the course of a very short time come to an end, it was deemed advisable that whatever might be left over should be vested in the Secretary of State in Council instead of in the hands of trustees who were under legal disability from transferring them to any other person.

Read 2ª (according to Order); and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

INFANT LIFE PROTECTION BILL [H.L.],

Considered in Committee (according to Order).

[The CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES, The Earl of MORLEY, in the Chair.]

SHORT TITLE.

1. This Act may be cited as the Infant Life Protection Act, 1897.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PERSONS RETAINING OR RECEIVING FOR HIRE INFANTS FOR THE PURPOSE OF MAINTENANCE TO GIVE NOTICE THEREOF.

(1.) Any person retaining or receiving for hire or reward in that behalf more than one infant under the age of five years for the purpose of nursing or maintaining such infants apart from their parents for a longer period than forty-eight hours, shall within the said forty-eight hours give notice thereof to the local authority.

(2.) Such notice shall truly state the name, age, and sex of such infants, the name of the person receiving the infants, and the dwelling within which such infants are being kept, and the name and address of the person or persons from whom the infants have been received.

(3.) If any such infant is removed from the care of the person who has received the infant for the purpose aforesaid, such person shall forthwith give to the local authority notice of the removal, and of the name and address of the person to whose care the infant has been transferred.

(4.) If any person who has retained or received any infant as aforesaid omits to give the said notices, or any of them, or knowingly or wilfully makes or causes or procures any other person to make any false statement in any such offence, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

APPOINTMENT AND POWERS OF INSPECTORS, ETC.

(1.) It shall be the duty of every local authority to provide for the execution of this Act within its district, and for that purpose it may appoint male or female inspectors, paid or unpaid, and may appoint or authorise in writing other suitable persons to execute the provisions of this Act, subject to such terms and conditions as may be stated in such appointment or authorisation.

(2.) Any local authority may combine with any other local authority for the purpose of executing the provisions of this Act, and for defraying the expenses of such execution.

(3.) Any inspector or other person duly appointed and authorised in writing by or on behalf of the local authority shall from time to time inspect any infants referred to in any notice given under this Act, and the premises in which they are retained or received, in order to satisfy himself as to the proper maintenance of such infants or to give any necessary advice or directions as to such maintenance.

(4.) If any person retaining or receiving such infants refuses to allow any such inspector or other person to inspect such infants or the premises in which they are retained or received he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

(5.) If any such inspector or other person is refused admittance to any premises in contravention of this Act, or has reason to believe that any infants under the age of five years are being kept in any house or premises in contravention of this Act, he may apply to any justice of the peace, who, on being satisfied that there is reasonable ground for believing that an offence against this Act has been committed, may grant a warrant authorising such inspector or other person to enter the house or premises for the purpose of inspection or of ascertaining whether any offence against this Act has been committed, and if the occupier of the house or premises or other person obstruct any inspector or other person acting in pursuance of such warrant, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

LORD BELPER said he had two or three Amendments to move on behalf of the Home Secretary. They were as follows:—

Sub-section (1), after the word "district," to insert the words:—

"and for that purpose it shall from time to time make inquiry whether there are any persons residing therein who retain or receive infants for hire or reward within the provisions of the preceding section."

Sub-section (1), to leave out the words "and may," and to insert instead thereof the words:—

"(2.) A local authority may, if it think fit, appoint male or female inspectors to enforce this Act, and, if any such persons as aforesaid are found in its district, it shall either appoint such inspectors or arrange for the infants being visited by ladies nominated by the local authority and authorised by it in writing to enforce the provisions of this Act.

"(3.) A local authority may also, if it think fit."

The object of these Amendments was to make the Bill more effectual for its purpose than the Act at present in force had proved to be, and also to make it enforceable, particularly in the country districts, without throwing unreasonable expense on the local authority. According to evidence given before the Select Committee, and also returns made to the Home Office, the present Act was really a dead letter in a very large number of places, although it was very efficiently carried out by the London County Council and in one or two other large towns. As the Bill stood, the onus was thrown on the person who takes in more than one child for hire or reward to give notice of the fact to the local authority, and he was afraid that in many cases the local authority, if they did not receive such notice, would practically do nothing. Accordingly, he proposed to lay it down as a distinct obligation on the local authority that it "should from time to time make inquiry." Under the Bill as it stood, moreover, there was no absolute obligation on the local authority to appoint inspectors, and he proposed that, where it was found there were houses where children were kept, in that case steps should be taken to provide proper inspection either "by appointing inspectors or arranging for the infants being visited by ladies nominated by the local authority, and authorised by it in writing to enforce the provisions of this Act." He believed that Boards of Guardians who had visiting committees would have no difficulty in asking such ladies to visit the houses, and make an inspection if necessary.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH thought the Amendments moved on behalf of the Home Office were calculated to make the Act more efficacious, and would do away with the reproach which had up to now been very justly levelled against the local authorities in connection with the present law.

Several Amendments mentioned agreed to; Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

NUMBER OF INFANTS RETAINED.

It shall be the duty of the local authority to fix the number of infants under the age of five years which may be retained or received in any dwelling in respect of which notice has been received under the Act, and any person retaining or receiving any infant in excess of the number so fixed shall be guilty of an offence against the Act.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5,—

PUBLICATION OF ACT.

It shall be the duty of the local authority to give public notice of the provisions of this Act, by the publication of an abstract thereof or otherwise as a Secretary of State may direct.

Clause 6,—

REMOVAL OF INFANT IMPROPERLY KEPT.

(1.) Should any infant, in respect of which notice is required to be given under this Act,—

(a) be kept in any house or premises which are so unfit as to endanger its health; or

(b) be retained or received by any person who, by reason of negligence, ignorance, or other cause, is so unfit to have its care and maintenance as to endanger its health;

any inspector or other person appointed for the purposes of this Act may apply to the local authority for an order in writing directing him to remove such infant to a workhouse or place of safety until it can be restored to its relatives or guardians or be otherwise lawfully disposed of.

(2.) Any person refusing to comply with an order under this section upon the same being produced and read over to him, or obstructing the inspector or other authorised person in the execution thereof, shall be guilty of an offence under this Act, and the inspector may apply to any justice of the peace for an order directing the removal of the child, and such order may be enforced by any police constable.

(3.) The master of any workhouse shall receive into the workhouse any child brought there under such order, and such child shall be maintained in the workhouse until it can be otherwise disposed of.

(4.) Infants shall not be retained or received for hire or reward by any person from whose care any infant has been removed under this section, unless with the sanction in writing of the local authority.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH moved, in paragraph (a), Sub-section (1), after the word "unfit" to insert the words "or so overcrowded." He moved them, he said, as an additional protection to children, and in deference to urgent representations he had received from people interested in the question, and more especially from various medical authorities.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH moved, in Sub-section (4), to leave out the words "Infants shall not," and to insert the words, "No infant shall." He explained that this was a drafting Amendment, intended to make it clear that no person who had been convicted of cruelty to children should be allowed to keep even one child for hire or reward.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH moved the following consequential Amendments:—

Sub-section (4) after the word "section" to insert the words:—

"or by any person convicted of any offence under the Prevention of Cruelty to and Protection of Children Acts."

Sub-section (4) after the word "authority" to insert the words:—

"and any person retaining or receiving any infant contrary to this section shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Amendments agreed to; Clause as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

NOTICE TO CORONER.

In case of the death of any infant respecting whom notice is required under this Act, the person having the care of such infant shall, within twenty-four hours of such death cause notice thereof to be given to the coroner of the district within which the body of such infant lies, and the coroner shall hold an inquest thereon unless a certificate under the hand of a registered medical practitioner shall be produced to him, certifying that such registered medical practitioner has personally attended or examined such infant, and specifying the cause of its death, and the coroner shall be satisfied by such certificate that there is no ground for holding such inquest. If the person having the care of such infant shall neglect to give the notice in this section mentioned he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

Every person guilty of an offence under this Act shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £5, or to imprisonment for not more than six months, as a court of summary jurisdiction may award.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

EXEMPTIONS.

The provisions of this Act shall not extend to the relatives or guardians of any infant by them retained or received as aforesaid; or to any person receiving any infant for the purpose of nursing or maintaining such infant under the provisions of any Act for the relief of the poor or of any order of the Local Government Board made under such Act; or to hospitals; convalescent homes or institutions established for the protection and care of infants and conducted in good faith for religious or charitable purposes.

The term "place of safety" shall mean any suitable place, the occupier of which is willing temporarily to receive such infant. The term "relatives" shall mean and include the parents, grandparents, and uncles, and aunts by consanguinity or affinity of the infant retained or received as aforesaid, and in the case of illegitimate infants the persons who would be so related if the infant were legitimate.

LORD BELPER moved the following Amendment :—

Schedule (England and Wales), to leave out lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, and to insert :—

"Other places.	The poor rate.

He said that the effect of the Amendment was to substitute the Board of Guardians as the authority for the Borough or District Council. He pointed out that the duties of the District Council were not similar to those imposed by the Bill ; and the Home Office and the Local Government Board were both fully agreed that it would be better to intrust the duties to the Boards of Guardians. Those bodies had in the relieving officer a suitable person to make the necessary inquiries ; and they would be more in touch with the persons employed for inspecting houses. Further, the Boards of Guardians had already certain duties under the Bill in respect of children in a house certified to be an unfit place for keeping them.

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH moved the following Amendment :—Schedule (Ireland), to leave out from the end of line 2 to the end of the schedule, and to insert instead thereof :—

"In all places.	The poor rate.
The poor law union.	The board of guardians."

He said that it was similar to the Amendment which had just been agreed to, and simply carried out the wishes of the Irish Office.

Amendment agreed to; Schedule ordered to stand part of the Bill.

CONVEYANCING BILL [H.L.],

*LORD DAVEY, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said that it was to simplify the titles to real estate, and also, in order to achieve that end, to assimilate the settlement of real estate to the settlement of personal estate. One of the chief causes of complexity of title, and of the consequent expense of purchasing real estate, was the great number of interests capable of being created as legal interests, and involving proof of births and deaths. All these questions had to be inquired into by any one purchasing real estate; and no purchaser could be advised to complete until it was certain that all the interests had been disposed of. In personal estate the case was different. If a man wished to settle stocks and shares, all he did was to vest them in trustees, who were registered, and the legal title then passed from hand to hand without any inquiry as to the equitable interests attached to the legal ownership of the trustees. The Bill proposed to make all the interests which could be at present created in real estate by settlement equitable interests, so that there would always be a succession of legal owners; and purchasers would not be bound to see to the disposition of the equitable ownership, and would be concerned only with the legal owner who had power to deal with the estate. In that way much of the complexity and expense would be done away with. It was not intended to interfere at all with the present power of settling estates; but the Bill provided that settlements should take effect only by way of equitable interest, capable of being enforced against the trustee, but having no effect on the purchaser who had obtained his title from the legal owner. The way in which this was done was by an adaptation of the machinery of the Settled Land Acts, known as Lord Cairns' Act. Under that Act the tenant for life had power to dispose of the fee simple of an estate, subject to the consent of certain trustees who were appointed trustees for the purposes of the settlement. He was under no restrictions, except that he must sell the fee simple for the best price that could reasonably be obtained, and no person entitled in remainder had any right to interfere with his disposition of the estate. There had now been some years' experience of that procedure, and it could be said to have worked well and with safety to those who were interested in real estate, while, on the other hand, it had been a great boon to many persons by enabling real estate to be disposed of in a way that was not before possible. What the Bill proposed was to convert the legal tenant for life, who had the power of disposition over the fee, into an owner in fee—to make the legal tenant for life own the fee over which he already had the power of disposition, but in trust for himself and the others persons entitled. The Bill was drawn so as to be applicable to existing settlements and to those which might be made hereafter. By the ownership of the fee being given to the tenant for life the trouble of obtaining trustees and the difficulty of dual ownership through trustees would be done away with. Upon the death of the tenant for life it was proposed that the estate should vest in his real representative. The Bill contained provisions for the appointment of a real representative, who would normally be the executor or administrator. In that way a succession of legal ownership would be secured, and the purchaser need no more trouble himself about any of the complicated interests involved than need the purchaser of railway stock. There was one clause of the Bill which it was probable their Lordships in Committee might consider one that ought not to be sanctioned by the House. That was the clause providing that Succession Duty and Estate Duty should be a charge on the estate owner, and not on the estate. But he was informed that there was nothing that created greater trouble and difficulty in dealing with the purchase of estates than the charges in respect of Estate Duty and Succession Duty being placed on the estate. The scheme of the Bill was not inconsistent with the Registration of the Title Bill of the present Session. Indeed, it would facilitate the work of registration contemplated by that Measure. The Bill had the support of the representative body of the solicitors, the Incorporated Law Society. It introduced no novelty in principle, while on the other hand it rendered much technical and complicated law obsolete as regarded both purchasers and mortgagees. He was quite conscious that the Bill would require careful consideration in Committee, when, no doubt, improvements would be suggested in its machinery which would greatly facilitate its working.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said the Bill was something in the nature of a new departure. He did not think the House ought to refuse to accept the Second Reading; but, at the same time, the Bill would, as the noble Lord who introduced it had frankly admitted, require careful consideration. He would, therefore, support the Second Reading, without expressing any absolute concurrence with this new scheme, subject to the arrangement that it should be referred for consideration to a Select Committee.

*LORD DAVEY said he had no objection to that course being taken.

Read 2ª (according to Order), and referred to a Select Committee.

PROVISIONAL ORDER (SCOTLAND) BILL [H.L.].

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Lord BALFOUR) rose to call attention to the present system of private Bill legislation as affecting Scotland, and to present a Bill. He said he need not go at any length into the history of the system of private Bill legislation, because its principle was as well known to the great majority of their Lordships as it was to himself. But he might mention that the system as now known only dated from 1837. Prior to that time the House of Lords, like the House of Commons, carried its private Bill legislation through open Committees of the whole House. It was in 1837 that this House adopted the system of appointing Select Committees constituted of Members of the House who had no interest in the subject of the Bill. The same course was followed by the House of Commons seven years later in the case of railway Bills, but it was not until 1855 that all opposed private Bills were remitted to Select Committees in the House of Commons. Since that time attempts had been made at intervals in both Houses to reform the system. These efforts at reform had proceeded on two main lines. It had either been proposed that the private Bill should originate in Parliament, as at present, and that the Committee stage should be taken before some outside permanent tribuanl, or else that the whole system of private Bill legislation should be referred to some such outside tribunal, and that the completed schemes only should come before Parliament for confirmation. The main object of every one of those proposals had been to relieve Parliament of the inconvenience and of the call upon the time of Members which was necessary for the due consideration of private Bills in the Committee stage. In 1869 it was suggested that this object should be attained by referring all private Bills to a Joint Committee of both Houses, instead of to a Select Committee of each House in turn, but that proposal did not at that time meet with much favour. In 1872 a series of Resolutions were proposed in the House of Commons by Lord Monk Bretton, then Mr. Dodson, which had for their object to test the opinion of the House upon the system which would be involved in the setting up of a permanent tribunal of judicial persons for the consideration of private Bills. A very long discussion ensued, and the proposal was a good deal criticised, mainly upon the same ground that he thought would be advanced against it at the present time—namely, that such a tribunal would become tied by its own precedents, and that it would not yield to the varying desires of public opinion with sufficient rapidity. The Government of that day accepted a Resolution, which was unanimously carried, that the system of private Bill legislation called for the attention of Parliament and required reform. Following upon that, the proposal for a reform of private Bill legislation was taken up by the late Mr. Craig-Sellar, who introduced Bills in the House of Commons in the years 1885, 1886, and 1887. In none of those years, however, was a Bill fortunate enough to obtain its Second Reading. In 1888 a Joint Committee of both Houses was appointed, of which he had the honour to be a member, and the terms of reference instructed them to report how the system could be modified in the interests of suitors, of the economy of the time of Parliament, and of the reduction of costs and charges. A Report was presented, not unanimously, but by a majority of that Committee, with the object of constituting, not a wholly permanent tribunal, but one which differed from the tribunals which they now had for the consideration of the Committee stage of private Bills. Of course, the reference to that Committee was in regard to the whole system of private Bill legislation for the United Kingdom. In 1889 the Government of the day tried to introduce a reform, so far as Scotland was concerned, as a part of their scheme of local government for that country, but that part of the scheme was dropped, and it did not receive the assent of either House of Parliament. In 1890, 1891, and again in 1892, Bills were proposed by the Government, and in one case a Second Reading was obtained, and the Bill was referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons. It was, however, a good deal altered by the Committee, and was not proceeded with. It was not too much to say, he thought, that every one of these attempts at reform of the system had failed either upon the question of the tribunal to which the Committee stage of Bills should be referred, upon the question of procedure, or upon the difficulty of defining to what Bills the new procedure should be applied. It was obvious that in the case of railway Bills it was not easy to find a definition which should be applicable to all cases. A small branch railway in Scotland was in all probability a purely local concern, but, if an attempt were made to amalgamate two of the large Scottish railways, it was quite clear that that was not only a Scottish question, but one which affected great English interests, and which should therefore be reserved for the consideration of Parliament. Then there was a class of Bills dealing with banking, insurance, and other companies; and, as the company law of the two countries was almost identical, it would be very inconvenient if new principles were established for one country which were not shared in by the other. It was very important that that class of Bills should not be withdrawn from real examination in Parliament. The need for some alteration in the present system was, however, really urgent, and it arose from two somewhat different causes—first, on account of the increasing dislike of Members of both Houses to the growing demands made upon their time; and, secondly, for local reasons. This desire for local inquiries he could assure their Lordships, was one which was very generally felt in Scotland; the demand by public authorities in Scotland to have the applications for Parliamentary powers in regard to local interests made the subject of local inquiry had recently acquired a very considerable addition of strength. There had been petitions from a great number of municipalities and County Councils in Scotland; and resolutions urging upon the Government the desirability of a change had also been passed by political associations, chambers of commerce, and many other bodies. The reasons advanced were the great expense attendant upon the present system, which was a bar to many small schemes on account of the great initial cost, and the unfairness which the great cost of Parliamentary inquiry entailed upon the opponents to large schemes who might not have the pecuniary means to present their objections which might be real and serious. He thought there was also a strong objection from a Scottish point of view to the entire centralisation in London of inquiries for purely local objects. Many such matters as extensions of municipal boundaries, proposals for fresh supplies of water, for tramway enterprise, and other matters ought, in the opinion of those interested, to be inquired into nearer the locality than was the case at present. He did not forget that, although separate Private Bills might affect only individual interests, yet the sum of all the interests that were involved in all the private Bills which came before Parliament was of very large importance. He certainly would not say anything which could be interpreted into hostility to the present form of tribunal. He dared say that mistakes were sometimes made, but upon the whole he believed the decisions of the Private Bills Committees, both of that House and of the other, were generally accepted as wise and fair. He believed that, so far as the individual tribunal was concerned, there was almost complete confidence in the system; the desirability of a change was based on other grounds. Certainly not the least valuable part of the present system was the general supervision over private Bill legislation which was exercised by the Chairman of Committees of that House, and the Chairman of Ways and Means in the other. As the result of many years' experience in the examination and amendment of Private Bills, the authorities of both Houses had settled the contents and phraseology of what were termed model Bills, which, with the necessary modifications, must be applied to all private Bills to which they referred. It was quite clear that Parliament could not part with authority over such matters as those, and he thought he should carry the House with him when he said that in such matters the proper amount of uniformity could only be maintained by keeping the ultimate control in the hands of both Houses through their Chairmen of Committees. So far as he was personally concerned he was not in favour of the appointment of one permanent tribunal to do the work of examining private Bills. Such a tribunal, however able, would get into fixed habits and form fixed prejudices out of which it would be difficult for them to raise themselves, and he was pretty certain that if such a tribunal had obtained in the past it would not so readily have adapted itself to the changed circumstances and demands of public opinion as had been the case with Private Bills Committees conducted and controlled by decisions of both Houses. In the consideration of possible reforms they were face to face with the fact that no scheme which had ever been mooted had attempted to do away with the ultimate control of Parliament. But the problem which had been fatal to many of these schemes had been this—how to make the control of Parliament real and effective, and yet get rid from Parliament of the labour of the Committee stage. As he had said, all the proposals that had been made had been on one of two main lines—one, that Bills originated in Parliament should be referred to the tribunal for the Committee stage, and come back again after consideration; another, that Bills should originate before a permanent Commission, and only come to Parliament in the form of completed schemes. It seemed to him that there were two objections which would always prove fatal to such proposals. Was the tribunal in either case to give reasons for its decision? If it did not, Parliament would have no material on which to form a judgment on appeal. If it did give reasons he was nearly certain it would become hidebound by precedents of its own creation, and it would be unfair to promoters. Either of these proposals would lead to more of the time—certainly of the House of Commons—being occupied in discussing private Bills on their merits, and whether they should be referred back to the tribunal or rejected. From the present demands on the time of the other House he felt that any system which led to an extension of the practice of private Bills in the whole House would not meet with general acceptance. The main objection to the present system was the demand it made on the time of Members, and the expense to which it put those concerned. The main object to be aimed at in any reform was to do away with these two objections, or to obviate them as far as possible. Now, there was a well-tried system in existence which exactly met the conditions he had laid down. He referred to the system under which Provisional Orders were granted, and the main proposal of the Bill was to assimilate Scottish Private Bill procedure to that which was now pursued in the case of Provisional Orders. As he had said there might be some schemes of such magnitude or nature as were not fitted for this procedure. He did not attempt to define them in the Bill. But it was proposed that if anyone interested in a Provisional Order, whether petitioner or opponent, thought the subject-matter of the Order was of sufficient magnitude and importance to be dealt with in the form of a Private Bill, he could petition the Secretary for Scotland to that effect. The Secretary for Scotland would lay the petition before the Chairman of Committees in each House, and these three—the Secretary for Scotland and the Chairman of Committees of each House—would be the tribunal to decide whether the subject-matter of the Order should be dealt with by Provisional Order, or was one that might be more properly dealt with by a Private Bill. The Private Bill system was at the present time worked by no less than 14 Government Departments, which worked under about 30 different Acts of Parliament. The procedure was well known, and he would not describe it in detail. A petition was presented by the corporation or individuals who desired Parliamentary powers, to the Department to promulgate a draft Order. The petition and draft order were referred to a tribunal selected by the Department, and on the report of that tribunal the Department decided whether it would grant the order and lay it before Parliament, or whether it would refuse the petition. The Provisional Order system had been successful in the past. Certainly it was cheaper than the present system of private Bill legislation, and it afforded facilities for local inquiries which might be in any part of the Kingdom affected. During the last 10 years the Board of Trade had made 624 Provisional Orders. Of these, only 62 were petitioned against, and only 19 of the 62 were rejected or amended. So he might claim that the system of Provisional Orders had been successful in the past, and there was no reason why, under the safeguards of the Bill it should not be applied to matters of greater importance and larger magnitude than had been the case hitherto. During the last 10 years the Scotch Office had put 28 Provisional Orders before Parliament, of which only three had been opposed, and two rejected. The system proposed under the Bill was that the promoters of a scheme should lodge a draft Provisional Order with the Secretary for Scotland, and copies with all the Departments concerned, and the Private Bill Office of both Houses. The object of this was to preserve general control over the model clauses, and the Chairman of Committees of both Houses, or anyone interested, might petition in the manner described to have the matter dealt with by Private Bill rather than by Provisional Order. Assuming that such a petition were not presented, or the Secretary for Scotland and the Chairmen of Committees decided that the proposal was a proper one for procedure by Provisional Order, the special procedure would be this: the Secretary for Scotland, acting with the Chairmen of Committees, would settle the tribunal which was to hear the opposition, if any, to the Order. This tribunal would be selected in the following way. It would consist either of a Judge of the Court of Session, or the Sheriff of one of the counties, either of whom would be selected by the President of the Court of Session. Along with this judicial person would be two lay Commissioners, who would be selected from a panel of twelve, and would remain in force for five years. The panel of twelve would be convened in this way. The Conveners of the County Councils of Scotland and some representatives of the boroughs would meet under the Chairmanship of the Secretary for Scotland, and would select twelve persons in whom they had confidence to form the panel from which the individual two would be selected by the Secretary for Scotland and the Chairmen of Committees to try each case that might be brought before them. If that tribunal made any alteration in the draft Order it would be the duty of the Secretary for Scotland to submit to the Chairmen of Committees of both Houses the Order in its new form, and if there were anything in their opinion contrary to the general legislation sanctioned by Parliament, it would be their business to communicate them to him. If against the Order so adjusted no memorial were presented, it would become final. But if anyone felt himself aggrieved and desired to take the opinion of a Parliamentary Committee it would be possible for him to present a petition to the Secretary for Scotland, upon which the Secretary for Scotland would be bound to lay the Order before Parliament in the form of a confirming Bill. When it got to Parliament a Joint Committee of both Houses would be formed to consider it, before whom, subject to liability for costs, any opponent might be heard. The proposal for a Joint Committee might not meet with universal acceptance. But he contended that it was a rational proposal, would economise a great deal of time, and it was the only method he could think of —if there were other methods he should be glad to hear of them—by which the control of Parliament could be effectively preserved without taking an undue amount of the time of Members or putting to undue expense those who had to appear before the tribunal. If, in addition to a local inquiry, they had first a Committee of one House, and possibly a Committee of another, they would not do anything to cheapen the cost of Private Bill procedure. But he believed there would not be many cases in which after a local inquiry an appeal would be made to Parliament. The experience of Provisional Order procedure strengthened that belief. No doubt the scheme he had endeavoured to outline was in some points open to criticism. The difficulty of the whole subject was great, as had been proved by its past history. He had done his best to make this a practical scheme. If it preserved the control of Parliament it would be found to have many advantages. It provided for a local inquiry before a competent yet not permanent tribunal. It enabled Parliamentary powers to be obtained without coming to Westminster, if opponents and promoters were satisfied. The Parliamentary inquiry, if demanded, would be a single one by a Joint Committee and not a double one by a Select Committee of each House, and certainly the supremacy of Parliament would be preserved in every case in which anyone who was interested desired to appeal to it. At the same time adequate safeguards were provided against any Parliamentary powers being granted which would be inconsistent with the general practice of Parliament or the due protection of the public interest. He was sure the House greatly regretted the absence from its precincts of Sir Joseph Warner, who was a long and well-tried servant of successive Chairmen of Committees. He thought it right to consult Sir Joseph as to these proposals, and he had had a letter from him in which, while making some criticisms—to some of which he had endeavoured to give effect—he said that he considered this—

> "the best practical scheme for localising Private Bill legislation that he had yet seen suggested by a competent authority."

The scheme was put forward with a full consciousness of the many difficulties of the question. He hoped he had been able to give an intelligible account of the Government's proposals, and he had thought it right in a matter of this magnitude to explain the scheme before the Bill was read a First time. ["Hear, hear!"] After this explanation he begged to move that the Bill be read a First time. ["Hear, hear!"]

*LORD TWEEDMOUTH thought that men of all parties in Scotland were agreed that a change in Private Bill procedure in regard to that country was desirable, therefore he was able heartily to congratulate his noble Friend in having seized that opinion, and having endeavoured to some extent to meet it It seemed to him, however, that the best ground, both for attack and defence of the Bill, would be found in the sentence: "It is such a little one." Without entering into any criticism of the Bill, he would point out that practically it would only deal with one very small section of private business—namely, that which was likely to be unopposed. If a Bill were likely to be seriously opposed it would, under the scheme, naturally come before Parliament in very much the same fashion as now. He quite admitted that, with regard to matters which were sometimes now dealt with by Provisional Orders, and sometimes by unopposed Private Bills, it would give new facilities and prove less expensive than the present system. But the necessity of this change had always been urged on the ground of the desirability of devolving from Parliament a great deal of its business down to the country, not merely unopposed, but also opposed, private business, and so giving larger scope to the expression of local opinion. It seemed to him that the Bill would not carry out this idea, except in the case of those Bills which were not likely to be opposed; and in the case of all great Bills it would still be necessary to come to Parliament. He did not think that Scotch opinion would be satisfied with merely having facilities given for the easier passage of unopposed private business, but would demand that private business as a whole should be dealt with by Scotsmen in Scotland. ["Hear, hear!"]

The Earl of CAMPERDOWN desired to ask two questions. The noble Lord had said that any person wishing to proceed by Provisional Order would petition. In that case who would draw up and start the Provisional Order? In regard to the panel of 12 men from whom the tribunal of two was to be selected, was it proposed to pay the members of that panel?

*Lord BALFOUR replied that the promoters would lodge the draft Order which they desired should be made. With regard to the second question, it was proposed that the two lay commissioners should be paid for the time they sat on the tribunal. It was not proposed that they should be salaried officials, or that any vested interest should be created. They would be eligible to serve for a period of five years, and might be reappointed to that office or might not. It would rest with the Secretary for Scotland and Chairmen of Committees to select those who were to sit with the Judge or Sheriff on each case, and for the time that they sat such remuneration would be paid them as might be fixed by the Treasury.

Lord MORRIS regarded the Bill as one which made a step in the right direction, but desired to know why a Measure of this kind was made applicable to Scotland and not to Ireland. There had been much agitation on the part of the Chambers of Commerce, leading merchants, and others interested in Ireland on this question, complaints being made of the enormous expense to which the country was put in Private Bill legislation. Every reason his noble Friend had given applied a fortiori to Ireland. It was a poorer country, more distant, and it was more oppressive and expensive for her people to come over her to pass unopposed Bills, or Bills to which there might be some opposition. He should be glad to know why this Bill had not been made applicable to Ireland, as it could have been by very slight alteration.

Bill to provide for improving and extending the procedure for obtaining Parliamentary powers by way of Provisional Orders in matters relating to Scotland; presented by Lord Balfour; and Read 1^a; to be printed; and to be Read 2^a on Thursday next.—[No. 81.]

LAND VALUATION (IRELAND).

*Viscount CLIFDEN rose to ask the Prime Minister if he would have printed and laid on the Table the > "instructions to the valuators and surveyors appointed under the 15th and 16th Vict. cap. 3, for the uniform valuation of lands and tenements in Ireland," by Colonel Griffith in the year 1853. He thought it was a very good time for these instructions made some 45 years ago, to be brought to light again. He was sorry to say that by the action of Parliament any valuation of that sort had become obsolete. Comparisons, if fairly conducted, might lead them to some tangible and reasonable result, and if noble Lords would look through these rules they would find that they were a marvel of honesty, industry, and intelligence. For instance, there were 64 instructions in connection with the valuation of tenements. How many of these instructions would the Land Commissioners who were now valuing Ireland look into? These men were reducing the landlords to abject poverty, and were taking the land out of the hands of one set of people to give it to another. They had had the official announcement from a noble Earl—who, he was sorry to say, was leaving them for the Antipodes—that there was no test or examination whatever for the new Sub-Commissioners when they were appointed, but that all of them had been seen by that eminent agriculturist, the Chief Secretary for Ireland. [Laughter.] Whether that was or was not sufficient for the English people he did not know, but it was not sufficient for him and those who thought with him, and he wanted English peers to understand what was well done some 45 years ago under instructions which were now thrown into the waste-paper basket.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH observed that, at the request of the Prime Minister, he would reply to the Question of the noble Lord. He was afraid the Government considered that, as it was some 44 years since the instructions referred to were issued, it was not advisable to have them reprinted and laid on the Table as suggested. When the Question was put down, it was not known whether the noble Lord was asking for information, or whether, as it now appeared, he was asking that the rules should be printed for the information of their Lordships; and he had brought down with him a copy of the instructions for the benefit of the noble Lord, who he now found did not require it. He was sorry the noble Lord had fault to find with the valuations as now carried on, but the House would hardly expect him to embark at this time upon such a thorny subject as the treatment of the land question in Ireland.

*VISCOUNT CLIFDEN thought he had gathered the noble Lord's determination, but he had not absolutely said he would not have the instructions printed. Again, the noble Lord had only very incorrectly noticed what had been put down in the Question on the Paper. He wanted to have the instructions which the noble Lord held in his hand, printed and laid on the Table of the House. Why should they not be put into the form of a Parliamentary Paper, and laid on the Table? ["Hear, hear!"]

THE EARL OF DENBIGH believed that the instructions were obtainable by any noble Lord who wished to see them. His instructions from the Irish Office were that the Government considered it to be inadvisable to print them, inasmuch as they were printed so long ago.

*VISCOUNT CLIFDEN said that this might be a good reason against reading the Bible, though he did not agree with it. [Laughter.] The statement containing the rules would be just as good now as it was when printed. It was very difficult to get the book. He had a copy of the volume, though it was not his own; but the book was a very different thing from having the instructions laid on the Table of the House as a Parliamentary Paper with the imprimatur of the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] He gathered, however, that the Government did not wish English peers to know how land should be valued in Ireland.

EARL SPENCER supported the appeal of the noble Viscount. He failed to see the force of the argument of the noble Earl against granting this Return. There could be no doubt that this was a matter of deep interest to all who were connected with Irish land. Griffith's valuation had always been looked upon as a valuable and excellent document. He was not sure whether these regulations were confidential; but, if they were not, he thought that the argument which the noble Earl had used as to their being printed so long ago ought not to prevail. ["Hear, hear!"]

House adjourned at Five minutes past Six o'Clock, till To-morrow, a Quarter past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 13th May 1897.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LOCHEARNHEAD, ST. FILLANS, AND COMRIE RAILWAY BILL.

Order for consideration, as amended, Read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now taken into consideration."

MR. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) moved to leave out the words "now taken into consideration," in order to add instead thereof the words "re-committed to a Select Committee of five Members, three to be nominated by the House, and two by the Committee of Selection." The right hon. Gentleman said that he thought that there were special grounds for his asking the House to take this somewhat exceptional course in this case. The proposed railway, if constructed, would run through the valley of the Earn, which was one of the most beautiful glens in Scotland, would destroy one of the most exquisite drives in that part of the country, and he did not hesitate to say that it would utterly ruin the peculiar charm of the locality. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill was opposed by a large majority of the local residents on various grounds, such as that the railway would destroy the beauty of the scenery, that it would reduce the value of their property for letting purposes, and that it would interfere with the numerous crofts in the valley. It was most unfortunate that the great majority of those who were opposed to the construction of the railway had no locus standi before the Committee, owing to the fact that it was not proposed to take their land, although undoubtedly the construction of the line would depreciate the letting value of their houses. But, in addition to the local residents, a large number of persons all over Scotland were opposed to the construction of the railway on the ground that it would completely destroy one of the most beautiful valleys in the country. It was most unfortunate that those who had a locus standi before the Committee had been induced to withdraw their opposition to the Bill, and that thus the Measure had been allowed to pass through the Committee stage as unopposed. A petition against the Bill had been signed by the most influential and representative men in Scotland, who, having no locus standi, had had no opportunity of laying their views before the Committee. It was on this ground that he had taken the somewhat unusual step of opposing the Bill at this late stage. The object of his Instruction was to empower the Committee to inquire whether the construction of the railway would affect materially the beauty of the scenery. It really embodied the ground of his opposition to the Bill. The House last year had instructed the Committee on the Light Railways Bill to make inquiries as to whether the construction of such railways would seriously detract from the natural beauty of the scenery of the district through which it was proposed they should run, and he now asked the House to take a similar course on the present occasion. He trusted that the House would take into consideration the strong local feeling that prevailed in reference to this matter, especially as there was another route along which the line might be made, which would not injure the scenery of the valley in any way. He trusted that the House would accept his Motion to recommit the Bill in order that the merits of the cases on both sides might be thoroughly inquired into. He begged to move the Motion of which he had given notice. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR DONALD CURRIE (Perthshire, W.) seconded the Amendment. He said that when the Bill was first suggested he was invited to promise to put his name on the back of it, and he agreed; but subsequently he felt it his duty to withdraw this promise, when he was told the details, on the ground that his constituents in the district, by a great majority, were unwilling that the Bill should be approved by the House. He had no reason to believe that they had changed their opinion. He was not going to discuss the question of the route, but he objected, in the interests of his constituents and of people in the neighbourhood whose property would be injured, as well as on the general grounds stated by the right hon. Gentleman, to the Bill in its present form.

*SIR JOHN LENG (Dundee) said that, like the hon. Member for West Perthshire, he had put his name on the back of the Bill. The hon. Member had withdrawn his name because of the conflict of opinion in his constituency. That consideration did not affect him. He was induced to back this Bill because, like a number of his constituents, he was in favour of multiplying, as far as possible, the outlets for their crowded population, both for summer residences and for daily excursions. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bryce) had said that the great preponderance of local feeling was against the Bill. That was one of the several points which the promoters strongly contested. Five petitions were lodged against the Bill, praying to be heard by counsel and witnesses, and these petitions were successively withdrawn, arrangements being come to with the petitioners; but the promoters were ready to go into the Committee, and had their witnesses ready to support every one of the statements they had made in favour of the Bill. With regard to the local feeling, it was as well that the House should know who were the actual promoters of the Bill. The Chairman was Colonel Hay Drummond, the Convener of the county of Perth, who would not from his position lend himself to anything that he believed to be either destructive to scenery or injurious to the interests of the county. The second promoter was the Lord Provost of Perth, a gentleman highly respected by all who knew him, and one who took a most active interest in the affairs both of the city and the county. An important business promoter was Mr. Fraser, of the firm of Macdonald, Fraser, and Co., auctioneers, Perth, who supported the line in the interests of the farmers because of the facilities it would afford for bringing their sheep and cattle into the market. The remaining promoter to whom he would refer was the Lord Provost of the city of Dundee, whose sole interest in the Bill was a public interest. Gentlemen who were familiar with the railway arrangements of the district knew that if they wished to go from the west of Scotland to the east through the city of Perth they must make a long détour to the south via Dunblane and Callander. The trains were very awkward, and loss of time was entailed in making that journey. By the construction of this short length of railway the distance would be considerably shortened. and they would be able to step into a train in Dundee and go over to Oban in about four hours. The opponents of the Bill had not availed themselves of the legitimate opportunity of opposition before the Committee. The Bill, having been initiated in the House of Commons, there was still the ordinary course left of opposing it in the House of Lords. The Committee of the other House would, no doubt, give fair and reasonable consideration to any and every representation that might be made to it. He was, as much as any man in the House, in favour of respecting the beauty of our scenery, but there was this difference between him and some other hon. Gentlemen, that while they desired to preserve the enjoyment of that scenery for the wealthier classes, he was in favour of extending to the masses of the people in our great towns and cities the privilege of also enjoying the grandeur and the beauties of nature. Concluding, he said he regretted that there had on this occasion been a departure from the ordinary course, and that the time of the House should be taken up with a discussion which in all fairness and propriety, ought to have taken place in the Committee.

Mr. C. B. RENSHAW (Renfrew, W.) said that those who supported the Motion for the recommittal of the Bill suggested practically that after a Measure had gone through all the stages prescribed by the Standing Orders, and its promoters had fulfilled all the conditions laid down, a new duty should be imposed upon them. According to the right hon. Member opposite, himself, there was only one precedent for the course which was proposed, and he (Mr. Renshaw) did not think that it ought to be followed in this case, there being no formal objection by the inhabitants of the locality concerned to the provisions of the Bill under consideration. He should certainly vote against the Instruction.

Sir CHARLES DALRYMPLE (Ipswich) associated himself with the right hon. Member opposite, and hoped that they would not be precluded from taking the course which he suggested merely because it was unusual. There was no doubt that facts which ought to have been considered had not been placed before the Committee to whom the Bill had gone. As a rule no doubt that House paid the greatest respect to the decisions of Committees, but this was an exceptional case. Considerations of convenience urged on behalf of the populations of large towns situated at a great distance from a district that would be affected by the construction of a railway ought not to prevail beyond a certain point, and he did not think that in this case such considerations ought to overrule the views of the inhabitants of Perthshire.

Mr. MELLOR (York, W.R., Sowerby) reminded the House that this was not an attempt to defeat the Bill, and said that he intended to vote for its recommittal. The point involved was a very important one. The question was what the House ought to do when a private Bill was introduced, and the petitioners against it disappeared. It was well known that there were people who wished to oppose Bills but could not afford to do so. These people ought to be considered, and the general public also. This Bill had been Read a Second time without opposition, because people who had not petitioned, but who desired to oppose it, believed that it would go to an ordinary Select Committee. The petitions against it were, however, withdrawn, and the Bill went in the ordinary course in such cases to the Unopposed Bill Committee, before whom no one could appear to give reasons against the preamble. There was no public officer whose duty it was to attend the Unopposed Bill Committee, or, indeed, any Committee to give information and protect the rights of the public. Who are the proper guardians of these rights if this House be not? It is plain that circumstances may arise in which it becomes the duty of this House to interfere and instruct the Committee as my right hon. Friend now proposes to do, and as was done in the Ennerdale case. The Members of the Unopposed Bill Committee were ignorant of the facts put before the House that day by his right hon. Friend, and the Bill passed through the Committee as a matter of course. Under the circumstances it would be simple justice to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, before whom opponents could appear and state their case. Railway promoters as a rule had hard hearts, and cared little for beautiful scenery or ancient buildings. Some years ago a railway promoter informed him that he had gone with a party to Kenilworth Castle to ascertain whether it could be converted into a railway station. [Laughter.] It was urged that the scheme which this Bill would sanction would seriously interfere with some very beautiful scenery. He took the view that they ought to do what they could to protect such scenery against disfigurement. The Bill should be sent to a Select Committee, before whom his right hon. Friend could appear and state all that he knew about this matter. Hon. Members would see from the statements that had been circulated that the allegations on either side were such that it was quite impossible for the House to decide this question itself. Whether the promoters of the Bill were right, or whether its opponents were right, the interests of the public ought to be protected by the investigations of a Select Committee. That would be the most simple and direct mode of inquiry, and it would result in justice being done.

Sir J. KINLOCH (Perthshire, E.) supported the Motion of the right hon. Member for Aberdeen. The railway could be constructed on the south side of the loch just as well as on the north, and if that course were followed the scenery would not be spoilt.

*Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Chairman of Ways and Means, Cumberland, Penrith) said that while he agreed with most of the statements of the right hon. Member for the Sowerby Division, he differed from him on one point. The right hon. Member said that this Bill ought to be sent to a Select Committee in the ordinary way. But that was just what had been done already. If the House agreed to the Motion of the right hon. Member for Aberdeen the promoters of the Bill would have just ground of complaint. They had done nothing wrong, but had complied in every respect with the Parliamentary conditions imposed on the promoters of railway Bills. The Bill was introduced in the ordinary way in January, and was Read a Second time on February 12, and not a word was said against it. The hon. Member for West Perthshire, who represented the locality through which this railway would pass, had told them that he was prepared at one time to put his name on the back of the Bill, but that he subsequently withdrew his approval of the Measure because there was so much opposition against it.

*Sir DONALD CURRIE said that when he was asked to promise his name on the back of the Bill he did not know what the route of the railway was. When he found out, before it was printed, what the route was to be, he intimated to the promoters that he should not give the support of his name to the Bill.

*Mr. J. W. LOWTHER thought that the course taken by the hon. Member was very natural. The hon. Member very reasonably did not wish to make himself unpopular with his constituents. But it was, in the circumstances, a singular thing that not a single word should have been heard against the Bill until that day. The Bill had gone in the ordinary course as an opposed Bill to a Committee. There were five petitions against that Bill, and the petitioners claimed to be heard. What happened? The promoters of the Bill came to terms with their enemies, and they agreed to certain conditions; and amongst others was one that they should pay the cost of the petitions. After a time they withdrew the petitions, and now hon. Gentlemen opposite asked them to take what he considered a very unusual course upon the Third Reading, asking that the Bill should be recommitted. He had no interest in the Bill one way or the other. He was only concerned to see that the private Bill procedure followed its usual course, and that justice was done to the parties. He thought injustice would be done to the promoters if the course suggested were followed. He concluded by saying that he asked the House to reject the Motion on this ground, that injustice would be done to the promoters of the Bill. It was his duty to vote against the Motion.

MR. BRYCE desired to make an explanation. He had never heard of the Bill until it had passed its Second Reading. Of course he would have raised the question then. He had made arrangements to move the Instruction while the Bill was before the opposed Committee, when suddenly the Opposition was "squared," and his opportunity was gone.

MR. R. B. HALDANE (Haddington), said he lived in the neighbourhood of this railway and knew something of the locality. Reference had been made to the position in which the House found itself through the petitions against the Bill having been withdrawn, and this Debate and the situation in which they were showed more than anything the necessity—for the measure to which the Government had given its sanction—for having some at least of these private Bill inquiries in the locality where the matter could be gone into. [Cheers.] The people who came before the House to give information in a matter of this kind were necessarily wealthy people. The public generally could not petition. In this case, one of the petitioners—Lady Helen Macgregor, whose property was affected—had withdrawn, because the expense of appearing with witness and counsel to oppose the Bill was greater than she felt she was justified in undertaking. The promoters had taken the position which a well-to-do corporation could always take, and had bought Lady Macgregor's opposition off. Allusion had been made to the costs which the promoters had paid, but they had not paid any of the costs of opposition before a Select Committee, or of bringing witnesses up, or, in fact, any of the heavy substantial costs of private Bill legislation. They had only paid those preliminary expenses which in their nature were not heavy. Those who represented the public in this matter had some right to complain. They were entitled to rely when these petitions were presented, and when they knew that there was some opposition to the Bill, that in the ordinary course the Bill would go before a Committee, where its merits would be investigated, and where the House would have some opportunity of satisfying themselves that the matter had been looked into. He agreed that the railway would confer great advantage, and he hoped to see it made, but that was not the question before the House. The question was whether it should be taken by a route where it would do inexpressible damage to scenery which was almost unique, or whether it should be taken by another route where it would do much less damage. The hon. Member for Dundee spoke of finding an outlet for the population of Dundee, on whose behalf he addressed the House. He agreed that there ought to be an outlet for the population of Dundee. But his hon. Friend spoke as if Dundee were somewhere near this scenery. Dundee was a good 50 miles away, and Perth at least 25 miles. The question was as to the route the railway was to take. Everybody directly connected with the locality had spoken strongly against the proposed route. Both the Members for the county were against it, and all the information that had reached him from people living in the locality was to the effect that they would regard the proposed route as injurious to their interests and unnecessary. The present request was a modest one. It was that the House should not sanction this proceeding without some investigation. If there were an investigation before a Select Committee they would then have a guarantee that the merits of the matter would be gone into. No substantial expense had yet been incurred, and the promoters would merely find themselves in the position in which they ought to have been if the matter had been properly dealt with in the first instance.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie) said the Bill had not been considered in the interests of the public. The hon. Member for Dund had given the names of those who now promoted the Bill, but he would call attention to the name of gentlemen who had ceased to be promoters. The hon. Member for the Western Division of the county had withdrawn his name. The Provost of Broughty Ferry and, he believed, the Lord Provost of Dundee, had also withdrawn their names as promoters. Why had they done so? They were reported in the public press to have said that they had been told that the inhabitants of Comrie were in hearty sympathy with the scheme; but when they went to Comrie and discovered the strong sentiment against the railway they withdrew their names. Five petitions were presented against the Bill, two of which were by railway companies and one by crofters, whose interests were injuriously affected. At the last moment, before the time expired for these petitions being lodged, one of them was withdrawn, and it was stated that certain persons whose property was to be dealt with had been very generously treated. Notwithstanding that, many people in small houses in the villages had been ruined, and had not had a penny given to them. He supported the Amendment on the general ground that, as a member of the public, he was entitled to oppose a Bill which was likely to do a great deal of harm in the neighbourhood through which the railway was to pass, and also on the ground that the majority of people whose interests were injuriously affected could not afford to employ counsel to represent them before the Committee. Dealing with the details of the Bill, the hon. Member was understood to object strongly to the fact that the proposed railway would repeatedly cross the high road and would therefore be a source of public danger. In the statement made by the promoters of the Bill it was said that the road was crossed only once. That was an altogether misleading statement, the meaning of which was that the road was only once crossed after leaving a particular village until Lochearnhead was reached. He submitted that the Bill ought to be recommitted, in order that the merits of the Bill might be gone into.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire) said he might claim to speak as an inhabitant of Perthshire, and he hoped he was not less careful of the preservation of beautiful scenery than hon. Gentlemen who opposed the Bill. The same idea of spoiling the scenery was advanced both in the case of the railway through the pass of Killiecrankie and Glenfarg, but those localities were still largely resorted to by tourists. If he gave his view as an expert in scenery, he would have preferred to see the railway taken on the other side of the loch; but he supported the Bill on much broader grounds. An hon. Member opposite spoke as if the Unopposed Bill Committee were utterly uninformed as to the merits of the Bill. So far as anything asked for by the promoters infringing on the general law, all these private Bills were very carefully scrutinised in the various offices, and if there were anything objectionable in them on that ground notice would be taken of it. The question of which side of the loch the railway should go was not a public question. The question now raised might have been raised before the Committee, and even now those who objected to the Bill could still do everything they wanted to before the Lords.

MR. BRYCE said he was obliged to make the motion in the House of Commons, because the question could not be raised without an instruction, and he had not heard of any instruction in the Lords.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE did not pretend to be familiar with the procedure of the House of Lords, but he thought that there would be ample opportunity found there to do what was desired. He should oppose the Amendment because he thought it would open the door to great inconvenience. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty) contended that there was no reason why the railway should not go on the south side of the Loch instead of on the north side. On the day before the Bill was put down on the Paper he saw the Parliamentary agent for the promoters, who agreed that the Bill should not be proceeded with for several days, yet on the following day it appeared on the Paper. He thought that was a very unreasonable course of proceeding after a distinct arrangement had been made. It would make him fight shy of making arrangements in the future, and never again would he take the word of that Parliamentary agent. [Cheers and laughter]. The House had heard a great deal about beautiful scenery. He admired scenery as much as any man in the House, but fine scenery would not fill empty stomachs. [Laughter]. He pointed out that in many cases crofts would be cut in two by this railway, without any provision being made for compensating the holders.

*MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said the Chairman of Committees seemed to be under the impression that the oppositon at this stage was due to the action of one of the persons concerned, who had petitioned against the Bill and then withdrawn the petition. He thought it was only right that the House should know that Lady Helen Macgregor did not do anything which led to the action of his right hon. Friend, or of others who were opposing the Bill. Any letters from her which had appeared were due to those who had written to her to obtain her opinion. The opposition originated with the inhabitants of St. Fillans, with whom he had had personal friendship for many years, and who had no locus standi. From his knowledge of the district and of their wishes he was convinced that his right hon. Friend was thoroughly justified in his Motion.

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER said the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty implied there had been some breach of faith on the part of the promoters. On referring to the Votes he found that the Bill was down for Second Reading on the 8th of February. Objection was raised to its being taken then, and it was not taken until the 12th of February. Four days therefore, were allowed.

SIR J. STIRLING-MAXWELL (Glasgow, College) protested against the line taken by the Lord Advocate and the Chairman of Committees. Both those Gentlemen had put the merits of the Bill on one side and addressed themselves to the question of procedure. Everyone admitted that a railway between the two points specified might be made with advantage, and yet everyone who knew the locality felt that the line proposed would interfere very seriously with the interests of persons who had not been sufficiently rich to oppose the Bill. Opposition was very expensive; and, if the House were going to allow every Bill to which opposition did not come up in Committee, it was quite clear that injustice would often result. He hoped the House would send the Bill to another Committee.

Question put, "That the words 'now taken into consideration' stand part of the Question:"—The House divided:—Ayes, 159; Noes, 175—(Division List, No. 207.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added:"—

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER said he was sure that as it had now been decided to send this matter back to the Committee, the House would not desire to deprive the promoters from stating their case before the Committee. He therefore begged to move the addition of the words, "And that the promoters have leave to appear by themselves, their counsel, or agents."

Words amended, by adding, at the end thereof, the words "and that the Promoters of the Bill have leave to appear by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents."—(Mr. J. W. Lowther.)

Words added.

MR. BRYCE moved:—

> "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire and report whether the railway proposed to be authorised by the Bill, will, if constructed along the line mentioned in the Bill, so seriously injure the scenery of the valley and lake along which it is to pass as to make it inexpedient to pass the Bill, and that the Committee have power to call witnesses and receive evidence on the subject."

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That the Bill be re-committed to a Select Committee of Five Members, Three to be nominated by the House, and Two by the Committee of Selection, and that the Promoters of the Bill have leave to appear by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire and report whether the railway proposed to be authorised by the Bill will, if constructed along the line mentioned in the Bill, so seriously injure the scenery of the valley and lake along which it is to pass as to make it inexpedient to pass the Bill, and that the Committee have power to call witnesses and receive evidence on the subject.

EAST LONDON WATER BILL.

*MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham) rose to move :—

> "That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the East London Water Bill that they have power to insert a clause providing that the term 'the annual rateable value of the tenement supplied with water' shall have the same meaning in the districts outside the metropolis supplied by the company as the term now has within the metropolitan area."

He said he was asking permission to place before the Committee now sitting a question that concerned a large number of persons resident beyond the boundaries of the metropolis. The charges for the supply of water were levied on the annual value of the tenement supplied with water, and those words formed the basis of all water charges levied within the metropolitan area and in the large area outside the metropolis supplied by the companies which also supplied the central area. The words were found in the Act of 1847, and for 41 years they were acted upon by the various companies, including the East London Companies, with more or less friction between the companies and the consumers. The frictions grew so great that in 1885 an Act was passed defining these words in the sense of the value set upon the tenement by the local assessing authority, but the Act applied only to the metropolis. Under that Act, the East London Company, in common with the other water companies, levied their charges on the annual value as defined by the Local Authority, but, as the Act was strictly limited to the metropolitan area, one set of charges for the supply of water by the East London Water Company obtained within the metropolitan area, and a totally different set of charges was made on the consumers supplied by the same company in the extra-metropolitan area. They had two tenements in the same street rated at exactly the same amount, but persons living on one side of the street, outside the metropolitan area, paid more for the supply of water than those living on the other side of the street, which was within the metropolitan area. He could not conceive any justification for the continuance of such an anomaly which was, in his opinion, a great injustice on the people residing in the populous extra-metropolitan areas. He asked, by his Instruction, that the Committee now sitting should have power to inquire into the circumstances, to hear evidence, and to decide whether or not this grievance should continue or whether it should be remedied by the incorporation of a clause in the Bill now under their consideration. The question was not now brought forward for the first time. In 1886, a Committee was sitting on the East London Bills and the then Chairman of the Committee, Lord Claud Hamilton, pointed out, on the 13th April, that—

> "The Committee are of opinion that a new clause will be wanted. In the opinion of the Committee it is very desirable that West Ham should be included for water purposes within the metropolitan area and should be subject to the same advantages both as regards continuous supply and the mode of rating as applies to the rest of the East London Company's District subject to the provisions of the Metropolitan Water Act 1871. No doubt the representative of West Ham will frame a clause carrying out the views of the Committee."

Some technical difficulties arose. It was pleaded on behalf of the companies, that the petitioners had not included this point in their petition, and on that point, and the further contention that there was not at that time a similar method of assessment adopted in the extra-metropolitan area as prevailed in the metropolitan district, the Committee finally decided against the extra-metropolitan areas. He was informed by those who ought to know that the second objection no longer holds good, inasmuch as the system of assessment had been revised in the extra-metropolitan areas and was now practically, on the same footing as the system within the metropolis. If that were the case, one objection had now disappeared, and the second objection, the mere technical objection, could not now be maintained. He did not want the House to constitute itself judge and jury in this technical question. It was a question which necessarily involved the presence of experts who would place before the Committee the evidence both for and against the proposal. He was not asking the House to pronounce an opinion on the question, but simply asking that the Committee should be given power to go into the question and to hear and determine the case on its merits. If the evidence satisfied the Committee that the existing condition of things rendered such a clause undesirable, they would reject it; but it was perfectly possible that the Committee would come to the same conclusion as the Committee over which Lord Claud Hamilton presided. He could not understand why there should be any objection to the proposal, seeing that the Instruction was only permissive. Certain of the extra-metropolitan areas had petitioned to have the clause inserted and they were alive to the possibility of their petition being rejected on the ground that the Committee had no power to deal with the question. He sought to remove that technical objection. He was told that the Bill was simply one asking for more storage, to enable the Company to discharge its statutory obligations to consumers within the area. To a certain extent that was true, but it was not the whole truth. The water company were asking for another half-a-million of money to provide storage, and consumers would reap a certain amount of advantage; but no one would convince him that the directors, in view of their obligations to their shareholders, were going to undertake this enormous work as a pure matter of charity to the consumers. The merest child must know that unless there were some profit to be derived, the company would not be likely to undertake the work. He had no wish to contest that point. All he wanted was that the Company should deal equitably as between ratepayer and ratepayer, no matter where they happened to reside. It was an injustice which ought no longer to continue, that people in London who happened to be separated by a street should be paying higher charges for water on one side of the street than on the other. He might be told that he was supporting a principle of robbery. He had no sympathy with any project that would deprive the water company of what they might legitimately claim; but he saw no injustice in enacting that the rates which prevailed in the metropolitan area should prevail in the other districts. He was told that the thing was an impossibility; that the same system of assessment could not be maintained in the extra-metropolitan area; that there were certain safeguards within the metropolitan area which did not exist without. That, however, was a purely technical point which ought not to be argued in the House, but should be left to the Committee upstairs. He had no interest to serve in the matter excepting that which he conceived to be for the benefit of his constituents. He was speaking for more than a quarter of a million of people who were paying rates to this company, which they considered to be abnormally high. It was not a question to which the stigma of robbery and misappropriation should be applied. His desire was to see common justice done as between the company and their consumers. He might be told that this was piecemeal legislation; that it dealt with one company instead of with the whole area. If he could have the whole of the water companies within his purview at that moment he would endeavour to apply the Instruction to the whole of them. But there was no reason why the consumers within the area of the East London Company should be excluded from the proposed benefit because it was not possible at the same moment to include other areas. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Instruction.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping), said that the hon. Member for West Ham had remarked that the terms misappropriation and robbery would probably be applied to his Instruction. He had several times argued the case of the East London Company, but he had never taken that line, or bandied such terms. The case of the company was that they wanted the increased storage to enable them to avoid the danger of drought. The hon. Member had also suggested that the company were asking for these powers with a view to making profit, that this was their only and their first idea. He said distinctly that profit was not their first idea, their first idea was to prevent their running short of water, and the hon. Member for West Ham had no right to impute to the company motives that were not actuating them. The hon. Member was simply endeavouring to extend Torrens' Act to the extra-metropolitan areas without those very checks that were provided by the House in order to ensure fair treatment for the water company within the area. The overseers of outside localities were interested in keeping down the assessment, because the contribution of the locality was based on its aggregate rateable value. The company would have no objection to the same charge being imposed on the extra-metropolitan districts if there were the same checks as to valuation. But even if the hon. Member's hypothetical street were included, there would still be a street beyond that. There must be a boundary somewhere. The hon. Member had called attention to a decision of a previous Committee which had claimed to be in his favour. But the decision of the Committee on the 13th April 1876, was given before the facts were fully placed before the Committee. When they had heard the evidence, Lord Claud Hamilton's Committee decided in the following terms:—

> "We do not insist on any change in the mode of rating, and only agree to a constant supply being compulsory on there being inserted the same conditions as are attached to other portions of the metropolis."

Another Committee in 1894, when the hon. Member for West Ham brought forward a similar proposal, decided as follows:—

> "The Committee have come to the conclusion not to go any farther with the West Ham Clause."

The same question came before a Committee of the House of Lords, and they decided that it would not be safe to interfere with or alter the law as it stood, and they declined to entertain the proposal. If the House of Commons wished to alter the law it ought not to do so by a roundabout method, but ought to deal with all companies that had extra-metropolitan areas, in the same way and in a public Act. It was unfair, after the company had made every effort to meet the objections of hon. Members opposite, that Instructions like this should be sprung upon them at the last moment.

MR. COURTENAY WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield) thought it curious that on the one hand the Government should think it right to relieve districts like West Ham from rates—and that they did think it right was proved by the introduction of the Poor Board Schools Bill—and that on the other hand they should allow the water companies to impose heavier rates upon those districts because they were just outside the London boundary line. The districts to which he referred were far more thickly populated than some of the districts inside the metropolitan area. That was true of West Ham, Walthamstow, and Leyton. The Essex population was quite willing to agree to any checks which the company now had against the people of London. In fact they wanted to be treated in the same way. The assessment was not kept down a bit more in Essex than in London. The Essex County Council took great care that the assessments should not be kept down, and they had gone up enormously in recent years. It was said that the company would not profit by this Bill. That might be true; but the company did profit from the increased consumption in consequence of the growth of the population in the extra-metropolitan area. That population was now being treated worse than the people of London, to whom the company gave the advantage of a preferential rate. He trusted that the House would pass the Instruction.

MR. F. G. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham) pointed out that within the metropolitan area there was an authority which laid down the proper way in which to ascertain rateable value, but that outside the Metropolis there was no such authority. The hon. Member for West Ham said that the rateable value was fixed in his constituency as it was in the metropolitan area. There was, however, nothing to prevent the local authorities of West Ham from making a change at any moment, for the powers of such local authorities were unlimited in regard to rates. Upon a house rated at £50 a year they could raise 1s. in the pound if they wanted £2 10s.; but if the assessable annual value were reduced to £25, they could still raise the same amount by increasing the rate to 2s. The water companies, however, could not do the same thing. When a water company came to the House, as in the present instance, and asked for certain powers in order to enable them to benefit the public, it was, to say the least of it, discouraging that Instructions of this nature should be proposed. On a previous occasion the East London Water Company had applied to that House to sanction the steps that were necessary in order that additional reservoirs might be established. The application was resisted on the ground that if it was assented to the profits of the shareholders of the company would be increased. But what had, in fact, occurred? The dividends had been reduced since then by 1 per cent. He asserted that the company had not brought this Measure forward with the object of increasing the shareholders' profits, but in order to guard the consumers against the risk of future drought.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said that he understood that the view of the company was that this was a Bill to supplement one which was introduced and sanctioned last year. That Bill gave greater storage power to the East London Water Company in order to obviate the risk of a recurrence of the water famine. In order to enable the company to carry the Bill of last year into effect this Measure was said to be necessary. An Instruction was now moved which the company alleged might be extremely injurious to them, and his hon. Friend asked that the Committee upstairs should be empowered to consider and discuss the question which was involved in that Instruction. But he apprehended that that was within their powers at the present time. The advocates of the Instruction were, it appeared to him, in this dilemma—if the matter could be discussed by the Committee what was the object of this Instruction? If, on the other hand, it could not be discussed, the supporters of the Instruction were calling upon a Committee to examine into questions which were outside the purview of the Bill. He did not think that adequate reason had been shown for adopting the course proposed. The matter, if dealt with at all, ought to be dealt with in relation to all the water companies, and a public Bill ought to be introduced for the purpose. In the circumstances he did not think that the House would be well advised in passing the Instruction.

*MR. ERNEST GRAY said that he realised that it would be perfectly futile to press the Motion to a Division in the face of the right hon. Gentleman's statement. He would therefore ask leave to withdraw it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LAND TRANSFER BILL [H.L.]

Read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed—[Bill 248.]

QUESTIONS.

PLYMOUTH HARBOUR WORKS.

MR. F. B. MILDMAY (Devon, Totnes): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty when the steam barge for the Plymouth Harbour Works Department, provided for in last year's Estimates, will be available for use?

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): It is probable that the steam barge will be delivered about the close of the financial year.

ARMY (SMALL ARMS AMMUNITION).

SIR A. F. ACLAND-HOOD (Somerset, Wellington): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the defective ammunition issued to the Guards at Pirbright for musketry practice; whether this is part of the issue which caused dissatisfaction last year; and, whether he will have it withdrawn from use as soon as possible and take steps to insure that it is not re-issued at a future date?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): A report has been received from a battalion of Foot Guards as to defective ammunition, and the supply has been changed. Careful inquiry into all the circumstances is taking place.

VACCINATION (ROYAL COMMISSION).

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board will he explain why a considerable part of the evidence and several of the Special Reports on which the Final Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination is based have not yet been published; and, when this Evidence and these Special Reports will be issued?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I have made inquiry, but have not received any information beyond that I have already communicated to the House.

EXCHANGE COMPENSATION (INDIA).

SIR SEYMOUR KING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is yet in a position to announce the decision of the Government of India in regard to the various questions still pending in respect of exchange compensation?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Exchange compensation is authorised for Europeans appointed in England, and for officers appointed as Europeans in India to offices in which European qualifications are held to be indispensable, or to services and departments in which a proportion of Europeans is held by the Government of India to be indispensable. The Government of India are now considering the rules which must be issued in order to carry into effect this decision of the Secretary of State in Council.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the Viceroy of India, the Governors and Lieutenant Governors of Presidencies and Provinces and members of the different Councils draw Exchange compensation allowance in addition to their salaries; whether the salaries of some of them are not fixed in rupees by statute; and whether the grant of the allowance taken without statutory amendment is legal; and whether it is a fact that the allowance is granted to such European officers as make no remittances to England; and, if so, on what grounds?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Exchange compensation has hitherto been drawn by all the European officers in India who are entitled to it under the regulations. Among these are about 40 officers whose salaries are fixed in rupees under Statute; and doubts have been raised whether, in their case, the compensation, though obviously equitable, may not be technically illegal. Opinions on that point differ, and the matter is now under my consideration with a view of obtaining further advice. The compensation allowance is intended to protect European officers in India against an excessive depreciation of their emoluments by the fall in exchange, and is confined by the regulations to those classes which as a rule are seriously affected by it; but it is not thought necessary or advisable to make any special inquiry into the private circumstances of individual officers.

BRIGADE OF GUARDS.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, whether all recruits enlisted for general service who are up to the Guards' standard are now taken for the Brigade of Guards at the expense of the rest of the Army; what are the numbers of recruits, exclusive of bandsmen and boys, raised for each regiment of Guards since 1st January 1897, and how many of these are specially enlisted; and what are the present numbers of each regiment of Guards above or below the establishment of 1896?

MR. BRODRICK: No alteration has been made in the recruiting regulations by which it has been laid down for some years past that recruiting for the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, and Foot Guards takes precedence of other recruiting. The number of recruits raised for each regiment of Foot Guards since January 1, 1897, was as follows:—Grenadier Guards, 235, of whom 75 were specials; Coldstream Guards, 143, of whom 39 were specials; Scots Guards, 131, of whom 40 were specials. On May 1 the Grenadier Guards were 30 above establishment, the Coldstream Guards 11 above establishment, and the Scots Guards four below establishment. It is necessary to add that, owing to the great activity of trade, and the consequent increase of employment, the recruiting for the Army generally has been unusually slack since January 1, and, while the numbers of Foot Guards have been more than maintained, the rest of the Army is short by nearly 1,600 men.

SIR A. ACLAND-HOOD: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, arising out of that answer, why, if the strength of the Foot Guards has been more than maintained, it has been thought necessary to reduce the standard to 5ft. 7 in.?

MR. BRODRICK: The hon. and gallant Gentleman is probably aware that there has never been an occasion when an increase in the Army has taken place that the standard has not had to be reduced. In the next place, we have not merely had to maintain the strength of the Foot Guards, but we have to add an extra battalion during the year. That is the reason why the standard has been reduced to that at which it stood for many years.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): Has any progress whatever been made towards adding this new battalion to the Guards? Does the battalion yet consist of a single man?

MR. BRODRICK: Yes, Sir, some progress has been made. We were below the establishment for the Foot Guards at the beginning of the year, and now we are above it in the Grenadier and Coldstream Guards. Measures have been taken for the recall of men from the Reserve, which we confidently anticipate will put us in a much better position altogether than before.

LAND SUB-COMMISSIONS.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that it is over 12 months since any court for the disposal of land cases from the union of Bawnboy has sat in county Cavan; and, whether he will inquire into this subject, and direct a Commission to hold a court for the dispatch of the large number of cases pending in this union?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): A Sub-Commission last sat for the disposal of fair rent cases from the Poor Law Union of Bawnboy on the 24th November last. It may be assumed that a sitting will be held there on the earliest possible occasion, having regard to the claims of other districts.

MR. S. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether a sitting of the Sub-Commission will be held in the present spring for the hearing of numerous cases awaiting trial in the counties of Meath and Cavan in the vicinity of Kingscourt; and whether, as was conceded to Bailieborough, the Commission, for the convenience of the people of that district, will sit in Kingscourt, between which town and Dublin there is easy railway connection, and in which there is an ample Town Hall and superior hotel accommodation.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: A Sub-Commission will commence its sittings at Bailieborough on the 18th instant. The Chairman of the Sub-Commission will consider any application that may be made to him for the purpose of holding a special sitting at Kingscourt for the disposal of cases from that district.

LAND COMMISSIONERS.

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, in view of the fact that it is expressly provided by Statute that the land certificates of tenant purchasers should be handed over to such tenant purchasers, will he explain why the Land Commissioners impound the certificates and decline to hand them over as directed by the Act of Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): Copies of the certificates are furnished to the purchaser, and the originals are retained by the Land Commissioners for the reasons stated at length by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the 24th of July, 1896, in reply to a Question addressed to him by the hon. Member for Cork City. I beg to refer the hon. Member to that answer, to which I have nothing to add.

ARMY HORSES.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a Commission has been recently dispatched to Argentina for the purpose of purchasing horses for the British Army; whether these horses could be as cheaply purchased in Ireland; and whether, having regard to the promise of the War Office authorities to give preference to home-bred horses, this order will not be repeated, and Irish horses purchased instead?

MR. BRODRICK: A small number of horses required for South Africa will be purchased in Argentina. Their cost when landed at their destination will be less than one-half of that involved by purchasing them in Ireland, and they will be older horses. Preference is always given to home or colonial horses when they can be obtained without serious loss.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Has my right hon. Friend considered the question of purchasing horses in Australia?

MR. BRODRICK: That question has been considered, but, the distance being equally great, the cost would have been double what it would have been for horses from South America.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to state the exact number of horses to be purchased?

MR. BRODRICK: I think it is 450.

PARLIAMENTARY CORRESPONDENCE (POSTAGE).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether, in view of the large surplus available principally for postal reforms, he will consider the advisability of recommending that all letters posted from the House of Commons during its sittings by Members of Parliament be sent post free, as the present arrangements entails a large tax on most Members for purely Parliamentary correspondence?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The Act 3 and 4 Vic. cap. 96 expressly abolished the privilege of franking which Members of Paaliament had previously enjoyed. I see no good reason why it should be revived even in the modified form suggested by the hon. Member. There is a special and practical objection to that suggestion—that the Postmaster General would have no means of knowing what letters were for purely Parliamentary correspondence.

COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND.)

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can state the amount of fees imposed as fines and recovered by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, under Section 6 of the Local Loans Act, 1892, and the number and amounts of the loans recovered by ordinary process by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland for each of the five years ending 31st March 1897.

*MR. HANBURY: The amount of fees imposed and recovered by the Board of Works under Section 6 of the Public Works Loans Act, 1892, was:—

Year.	Fees. £	s.	d.
1896–7	712	17	5

These figures of course can only refer to loans granted after the passing of the Act. The numbers of half-yearly instalments recovered in each of the same years were respectively:—

1896–7	62,000 approximately,

(the number of loans being in each case half the number of the instalments). And the total amounts so recovered were—

These figures, however, include loans granted before, as well as those granted after, the passing of the Act. To separate the two would take very great time and trouble, but the total amounts recovered in respect of loans granted after the passing of the Act are roughly estimated to be as follows:—

In the latter year, as I have already stated, the amount of Fees imposed under the Act was £712 17s. 5d. The Fee being one shilling on every pound more than a month in arrear, this amount represents arrears of more than £14,300 out of a total of £132,000 recovered, or considerably over 10%. The large increase of the amounts received from £76,000 in 1895-6 to £132,000 in 1896-7 is due to the Seed Loans of 1895, amounting to about £65,000, repayable in two years; and as I have already explained in reply to previous Questions, interest on these loans is payable not by the localities but out of the Irish Church Fund, so if the Fees were not enforced, there would be little inducement to the localities to repay the loans.

SCIENCE AND ART SCHOOLS (GRANTS).

MR. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education (1) at what date the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on Grants to Science and Art Schools, as adopted by the Committee of Council, are to take effect; and (2) whether the Science and Art Directory will henceforward be laid upon the Table of the House for one month before it comes into force?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): The recommendations of the Committee are at present being considered by the Committee of Council. The Committee of Council do not consider that the course suggested in the second paragraph would be advisable.

WEIGHING OF CATTLE (SCOTLAND).

MR. J. G. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he receives, in virtue of the provisions of Section 3 of The Markets and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Act 1891, from the five scheduled cities in Scotland satisfactory weekly Returns of the prices of live stock sold therein; and, if so, whether he is prepared in terms of Subsection (2) of Section 3 of the said Act, for the information of the large number of farmers in Scotland who have erected cattle-weighing machines at their farms, and who are selling their fat cattle to butchers direct instead of sending them as formerly to the auction marts, to publish these Returns, or abstracts thereof, weekly instead of quarterly as at present, in the same way as is done by the Board of Agriculture in regard to the average price of British grain?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. WALTER LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): Yes, Sir; I do receive fairly satisfactory returns, but there is still room for improvement. I cannot, however, adopt the suggestion in the last part of the Question.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, (1) whether, having regard to the fact that for the year 1896 there were 8,076 cases in which the telegraph was used merely for giving notice of withdrawal from the Post Office Savings Bank, the withdrawal Order itself being sent by post, will he state the average cost to the depositor of each such withdrawal; and (2) having regard to the fact that for the year 1896 there were 94,477 cases in which the advice authorising payment was sent by telegraph, will he state the average cost to the depositor in each of these cases of withdrawal in which, in order to have payment authorised by telegraph, he had to pay for two telegrams?

*MR. HANBURY: The answer to the first Question is 9d., and to the second 1s. 3d.

PARISH COUNCILS (SCOTLAND).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the amended regulations under which telegraph extensions may be provided under guarantee, he will state when he expects to introduce the promised Bill which will place parish councils in Scotland on the same footing as similar councils in England in regard to guarantees.

*MR. HANBURY: I hope to introduce a Bill containing this provision within the next few days.

PUBLIC WORKS (SCOTLAND).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate (1) whether his attention has been called to a resolution moved at a recent meeting of the Ross-shire County Council by one of the leading supporters of the Government in the county, and unanimously carried, in which it was declared that the Council views with astonishment and dismay the reduction of the Vote for public works and communications in the Highlands by over £10,000; and (2) whether, in view of the fact that the stoppage of harbour works (such as Bayble) which have already cost the promoters considerable sums of money, and which have been promised by the Scottish Office, will be productive of very great hardship to the promoters, he will make some provision under which those works, which have already been entertained at the Scottish Office, may be proceeded with without delay?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. As regards the second portion of his Question the hon. Member is mistaken in supposing that any harbour works have been stopped for which promises were given. He is aware that the cost of such works after being entertained by the Scottish Office must be sanctioned by the Treasury—who have not seen their way to make provision for these works this year.

PORT NESS HARBOUR (LEWIS).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any steps have been taken to free the harbour of Port Ness, Island of Lewis, from the huge concrete blocks which fell into the harbour during the construction of the harbour works; and whether he is aware that these blocks are a serious source of danger to the fishermen in the pursuit their calling?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE: I am informed by the engineers of the works that the blocks referred to have not been removed owing to the weather not yet being suitable for doing so. They also assure me that the blocks are not a source of danger to the fishermen.

TELEGRAPH OFFICES (PUBLIC GUARANTEE).

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the proposed reductions in the guarantees for telegraphic extension will be made retrospective to relieve guarantors in places where telegraph offices have not paid working expenses?

*MR. HANBURY: The concession to be made will apply to existing guarantees. The form which the concession takes is that the Exchequer will share the loss, if any, equally with the guarantors. It will come into operation on Jubilee Day, and will from that date apply to both future and existing guarantees.

POST OFFICE (DELIVERY OF LETTERS).

MR. ARTHUR JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, under the new regulations for the delivery of letters to every hamlet and house, due care will be taken that no delay shall occur in the present delivery of letters to the various villages and houses in the rural districts?

*MR. HANBURY: In the endeavours which are to be made to extend the delivery of letters to every hamlet and house in the kingdom care will, of course, be taken to maintain as far as possible all existing facilities, but the Postmaster General cannot pledge himself that, in the multiplicity of re-arrangements which will become necessary, no place or house shall in any case be served in the least degree later than at present.

TELEGRAPHIC ADDRESSES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a telegram addressed "Prime Minister, Natal," was refused on the ground of insufficient address at the Hammersmith Post Office on 8th May; and whether a telegram addressed to the Prime Minister of England would receive like treatment?

*MR. HANBURY: The telegram in question was not refused at the Hammersmith Office, but was duly forwarded to the Telegraph Company concerned. It was, however, returned by the Company with the request that if the telegram were intended for South Africa the name of the telegraph office might be inserted. A telegram addressed merely to the name of the country of destination does not comply with the regulations of the International Convention, which require that the name of the terminal telegraph office should be given. The regulations of the International Convention would apply to the Prime Ministers of England and Natal equally.

TELEGRAPH CHARGES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the telegraph officials at the West Strand Office on Saturday last insisted on charging "McCalmont" as two words; and whether these are the same officials who insisted on charging a person last year "bonheur" as two words?

*MR. HANBURY: I must ask my hon. Friend to postpone this Question, as the answer I have received from the Post Office is quite unintelligible to me. [Laughter.]

RATING ASSESSMENT.

MR. FINCH-HATTON (Notts, Newark): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, the rateable value of a tenement having been reduced in the autumn of one year at the quinquennial valuation, the said reduction to take effect on 6th April of the ensuing year, a vestry or other rating authority is entitled during the ensuing year to demand rates under the old assessment, on the ground that the rates for the whole year are fixed in the month of March previous to the reduction taking effect, notwithstanding that the said rates are payable quarterly, the result being that rates are demanded during a period of 18 months on a rateable value which has been declared excessive?

MR. CHAPLIN: The new valuation list comes in force on 6th April and only affects rates made after that date. The quarterly instalments payable in respect of a rate made in the preceding March must therefore be based on the valuation in force at the time the rate was made. There is only one exception. If the rate made in March was made on the rateable value as fixed by a provisional list, and that value is more than the value fixed by the new list which comes in force in April, the amount of rate overpaid is to be repaid, and presumably any unpaid instalments are to be diminished accordingly.

POST OFFICE (GRATUITIES TO POSTMEN).

MR. FINCH-HATTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that postmen have been forbidden by the authorities of the General Post Office to ask for Christmas boxes, without any compensation being given to them for the loss thereby entailed; and, whether it is the case that Christmas boxes have hitherto always been officially recognised as part of the wages of postmen?

*MR. HANBURY: I am of course aware that postmen have been forbidden in future to ask for Christmas boxes, and that their witnesses complained strongly before the Tweedmouth Committee, of the indignity which asking for Christmas boxes imposed upon them. I am also aware that in the provinces it has hitherto been forbidden to ask for them by printed card or letter, and that the London and provincial postmen are now for the first time brought under the same regulations. The Committee did not anticipate that to forbid solicitation would lead to any considerable diminution in the amount of Christmas boxes received from the public, and it is a fact that, although parcel postmen have always been forbidden to solicit Christmas boxes, they nevertheless receive them, although no old custom of giving to them could exist in their case as it does in that of the letter postmen. When the hon. Member speaks of compensation he is, perhaps, not aware that the Christmas boxes are by no means equally distributed among even the letter postmen, and that, while the juniors receive little or nothing on some walks, the seniors receive very much more than their share. Any system of compensation would in any case therefore be very difficult to carry out.

But with the advantages given by the recommendations of the Committee, which have been accepted wholesale by the Treasury, the postmen, so far from losing, gain considerably. It is not the fact that Christmas boxes have been officially recognised as part of the wages of postmen.

VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS ACT.

*MR. ERNEST GRAY (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, if the managers of a school join an association under the conditions set forth under the Voluntary Schools Act, and such managers afterwards withdraw from the association, their school would continue to receive special grants at the same rate as when the school was represented in the association, providing the necessity of the school remained the same; and, whether, if the managers of any school decline to join an association when it is first formed, the association could refuse to admit representatives of such managers at any subsequent date if the managers then desire to join the association?

SIR J. GORST: The Committee of Council cannot lay down a general rule applicable to all the hypothetical cases suggested by the hon. Member. Every case would have to be considered on its merits and with reference to the special circumstances.

*MR. MELLOR (York, W.R., Sowerby): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Council whether his attention has been called to the speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury in Convocation, in which he advises the Bishops and Clergy to proceed to divide the country into ecclesiastical districts for the purposes of association under the Voluntary Schools Act; and whether he is prepared to sanction such a scheme?

SIR J. GORST: Under the Voluntary Schools Act it is for the managers, and not for the Education Department, to initiate proposals for areas of association. The Education Department are prepared to, as stated in the minute of April 19, consider proposals as to areas made to them by bodies of managers which comply with the conditions.

DEPORTATION OF PAUPERS.

MR. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that in January 1896, the Local Government Board for Ireland sent a notice to the Local Government Board for England suggesting a committee of inquiry regarding the deportation of paupers from England to Ireland; (2) whether he is aware that the Local Government Board for England replied their willingness to nominate a member to serve on proposed committee of inquiry; and (3) whether he can state what steps the Local Government Board of Ireland have taken to carry out their part in the inquiry suggested?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The reply to the first and second paragraphs is in the affirmative. The proposal was to form a Departmental Committee, consisting of an officer to be nominated by the Local Government Boards of England, Scotland and Ireland, but the proposal fell through as the Scottish Board did not see its way to appoint a representative to act on the committee.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster-General, whether postal employees will receive a whole or partial holiday on 22nd June; and whether it will be possible at least to suspend all mails after the first delivery, and close telegraph offices after 10 a.m. as on Sundays, so that postal employees may participate in the general holiday.

*MR. HANBURY: June 22nd will be a Bank Holiday, and the ordinary Bank Holiday rules as to leave will apply. As regards the suspension of mails and the closing of telegraph offices, the arrangements will be the same as on ordinary Bank Holidays. Generally speaking, only one mail will be received and one dispatched. The telegraph offices will, as a rule, be kept open as on ordinary days to meet the convenience of the public, but the less important offices in towns will be closed as far as possible. Rural post offices at which telegraph business is not transacted will be closed at noon.

MR. F. WOOTTON ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, considering the few opportunities the inhabitants of the East End of London have of seeing the Colonial and Indian troops, whether arrangements could be made during Jubilee week to march the Home, Colonial, and Indian troops, with their bands, through the principal thoroughfares of the East End of London, say from Whitechapel to Victoria Park, returning by way of Bethnal Green and Shoreditch?

MR. BRODRICK: It is intended to give as much opportunity as possible to all classes to see the troops collected for the Jubilee; but no arrangements can at present be made public.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (York, N.R., Thirsk): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is his intention to propose any, and if so what, arrangements as to the attendance of Members of the House of Commons at St. Margaret's Church or elsewhere on Sunday the 20th of June at a Thanksgiving Service in celebration of the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have to say that, after consultation with Mr. Speaker, and after obtaining such information as I could, it seems quite clear that, acting on the precedent of 1887, we ought to have a service on the Sunday preceding Jubilee Day. ["Hear, hear."] With regard to the details, I have been in consultation with Mr. Speaker, and I can at present only say that in all probability the broad precedent set in 1887 will be followed on the present occasion.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he thought the service should be held before June 20, seeing that a large number of Members would then be out of town, and whether it would not be more convenient to have the service on the Sunday following. [Cries of "No, no."]

MR. W. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.) asked whether June 20 was not a peculiarly appropriate day, as being the actual date of the Queen's accession.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Probably June 20 would be the most convenient day.

SIR ELLIOTT LEES (Birkenhead): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the authorities who have arranged the route for Her Majesty's forthcoming procession on the 22nd June, have considered the facilities which could be afforded to Naval and Military pensioners, as well as to sailors and soldiers on the active list, for viewing the procession, if the route were slightly altered so as to pass Wellington Barracks; whether they have considered that the configuration of the ground adjoining Birdcage Walk forms a natural stand for spectators on foot, whereas the ground adjoining the Mall is lower than the roadway and is ill adapted for enabling more than one or two rows of spectators to obtain a view; whether, since no stands are to be permitted in St. James's Park, any inconvenience or disappointment could be caused to anyone by the alteration of the route; and whether, since the distance from Whitehall and the Horse Guards Parade, via the Foreign Office, or Birdcage Walk to Buckingham Palace is not appreciably longer than that by the centre Mall, he is prepared to consider the practicability of such alteration, and, should it be found practicable, to recommend it?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): In answer to the hon. Baronet I have to say that the route of Her Majesty's procession on the 22nd of June has been settled for some time and cannot now be changed.

MR. MACNEILL wished to know from the First Lord of the Treasury whether there was any foundation whatever for the statement, which had been very definitely made that morning, that the Sultan of Turkey was sending his son to take part in the Jubilee proceedings [ironical Ministerial laughter], and, if that were so, who had given the invitation?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I know nothing about it.

MR. MACNEILL said he would repeat the Question to-morrow.

ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND.

MR. KEARLEY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will arrange for a Copy of the Supplemental Commission, now being acted upon by the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, to be laid before Parliament at an early date?

Mr. BRODRICK: I have laid on the Table this day a copy of the Supplemental Commission.

NOTIFICATION OF INFECTIOUS DISEASES ACT.

Sir JOHN BRUNNER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board how many local authorities have adopted the Notification of Infectious Diseases Act, and what proportion that number is of the whole number empowered to adopt it?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Excluding London, where the notification of infectious disease is compulsory under the Public Health (London) Act 1891, the Local Government Board have, up to May 11th, 1897, received information of the adoption of the Infectious Diseases (Notification) Act 1889, in 654 rural districts out of a total of 671 rural districts, and in 904 urban districts out of 1,088 urban districts. But in 49 of the 184 urban districts where the Act of 1889 has not been adopted the notification of infectious disease is compulsory under provisions in local Acts.

CASHEN RIVER, BALLYBUNION.

Mr. MICHAEL FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that great injury has been caused to property and land adjoining the Cashen River, near Ballybunion, during the early part of March last by the overflowing of the Cashen River; whether he is aware that this is a frequent occurrence; and whether, owing to the very high taxation on the people of this district, some relief will be granted to them?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I am informed that early in March the River Cashen overflowed its banks, and that similar overflows have previously taken place. I have no reason to believe that the injury caused by the floods was extensive. It does not appear to be a case calling for the assistance of Government.

WATERFORD, DUNGARVAN, AND LISMORE RAILWAY.

Mr. P. J. POWER (Waterford, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will now state, for the information of the guaranteeing ratepayers of Waterford County and City who have a larger financial interest than the Treasury in the Waterford, Dungarvan, and Lismore Railway, what company or companies are negotiating for the purchase of that line?

Mr. HANBURY: No, Sir; any negotiations are of course confidential.

TELEGRAPH OFFICE (DUNGENESS).

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he is aware that the Telegraph Office at Dungeness has recently been placed in the house of the agent of Foreign tug owners, and, having regard to the suspicion thus aroused in the minds of British tug owners and others that this gives advantageous priority of information to their foreign rivals, if the Postmaster General will take an early opportunity of considering whether it would not be better to have the office removed to a more neutral location?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware of the fact mentioned by the hon. Member, but he has received no representations on the subject from British tug owners. When he decided to extend the telegraph to the house in question, he had every assurance that the sub-postmaster would act in strict accordance with his duty and he sees no reason to remove the office.

COUNTY COUNCIL (ACCOUNTS).

Mr. EDWARD STRACHEY (Somerset, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, referring to their circular letter of the 29th March, 1889, whether sufficient experience has now been gained, since the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888, to enable them to prescribe the form in which the accounts of the receipts and expenditure of County Councils shall be kept?

Mr. CHAPLIN: The Local Government Board have prescribed a form of financial statement for County Councils, which has served as a basis upon which the County Council have modelled the accounts of their receipts and expenditure, and uniformity in the system of keeping the accounts generally has to a great extent been secured by the action of the District Auditors. The form of accounts with respect to the administration of the Technical Instruction Act is less settled than other accounts of the County Councils, and I am advised that it is expedient that some further experience should be obtained with regard to this branch of the accounts before an Order is issued. I may say, however, that the question of the issue of an Order will not be lost sight of.

TELEGRAPH POSTS (YEOVIL).

MR. STRACHEY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, why no reply, except formal acknowledgments, has been sent to letters dated the 24th June, 14th August, 21st October, 11th November and 10th December of 1895, and 20th February 1896, from the Town Council of Yeovil in reference to certain telegraph posts on a road within the area of that borough; and whether, in view of the danger and obstruction caused to the public using this road, which is the main thoroughfare between the two railway stations of the town, the Postmaster General will assent to the request of the Town Council, contained in their letter dated the 24th June, 1895, and take immediate steps to remedy the present dangerous condition of the road caused by the telegraph posts standing out in some cases from six to nine feet from the side of the road?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General much regrets to find that through an oversight the result of the Inquiry which was at once instituted with reference to the request of the Town Council of Yeovil in their letter dated the 24th June, 1895, as to certain telegraph posts on a road within the area of the borough, was not communicated to the Council. The request was to the effect that the wires should be placed underground; and it was found that the circumstances did not justify the Department in acceding to it. The poles affected stood at that time in the banks or margin of the road, out of the way of traffic; but it may be that, owing to alterations which have since taken place in the road, the case is now different; and the Postmaster General, as soon as he received notice of the Question, gave instructions for further immediate inquiry, and ordered that steps were to be taken to set right anything which might be found to constitute a source of danger or obstruction.

SCOTCH HERRINGS (ST. PETERSBURG).

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether, in view of the special facilities which the Russian Government is reported through Her Majesty's Ambassador, Sir N. O'Conor, to be making for the acceleration of the landing of Scotch herrings at St. Petersburg, he will again consider the expediency of approaching the Russian Government with a view to a reduction of the duty on herrings imported from Scotland, as recommended in the Fourteenth Annual Report of the Fishery Board for Scotland?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to the hon. Member on February 2nd.

CRETE.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is proposed to continue the blockade of Crete now that the Greek troops have been withdrawn?

*MR. CURZON: Although Colonel Vassos and some other officers have left Crete, the Greek troops have not yet been withdrawn. Arrangements are, however, being made for the removal of a first batch of 400. The question of the continuance of the blockade is under examination by the Admirals; and there can be no doubt that, as soon as it is found to be unnecessary, they will at once suggest that it should be raised.

MR. DILLON: Are we to understand, then, that the question of raising the blockade is to be left to the Admirals?

*MR. CURZON: No, Sir, the hon. Member is to understand nothing of the kind. The question will of course rest for decision with the Governments, but they cannot act until they have received the views of the Admirals.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Cretan refugees from Candia and Canea who are now in Greece are free to return to their homes; and whether, if they do so, the forces of the Powers now in occupation of those towns will guarantee their safety?

*MR. CURZON: The Cretan refugees from Candia and Canea have always been free to return to the Island, and there would probably be no objection to the return to Canea of those who have homes in that town; but so long as the Mussulmans who have been driven by the Insurgents from their homes in the interior are kept penned up in Candia by the Insurgent forces, they are likely to oppose even by force the return of the Christians to the houses in the town abandoned by them, and since occupied by Mussulman refugees. The forces of the Powers now in occupation are not sufficiently numerous to guarantee the prevention of bloodshed in such an eventuality. It will be necessary to allow time for some arrangement to be made for the return of the Mussulmans in Candia to their homes before the Christians who have left that town can with safety come back.

MR. DILLON: Do I understand that the refugees from Canea can return with the assurance that their lives will be safe?

*MR. CURZON: Of course it is not for me to give any assurance of that kind. The information, however, which we have received from the Admirals and Consuls leads us to think that the return can be safely carried out.

GAMBLING RAID (HULL).

SIR SEYMOUR KING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that last month the police made a raid on the "Prince George" public house in High Street, Hull, and arrested a number of persons on a charge of haunting and frequenting for the purpose of gaming, among whom were some working men who had entered the bar a few minutes previously to the arrest, and were subsequently discharged, no evidence being produced against them by the police; whether he is aware that these men were marched through the streets by the police to the station, searched, and detained in custody from shortly after three in the afternoon until enlarged by the magistrate on bail on the next afternoon, bail being refused although two magistrates were prepared to offer it, and subsequently had to appear twice at the Police Court, losing in all three days' work; whether he has been informed that the cases of these men have created general indignation in Hull and throughout Yorkshire; and if he is prepared to recommend that they shall be compensated for the loss to which they have been subjected?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): My attention was first called to this case by the hon. Member's Question, and I have no information at all of its having excited a general feeling of indignation in the county. It has been impossible for me to obtain a full report of the facts, but I have no reason to doubt that they are, substantially, as stated in the Question. The arrests, however, were effected on a warrant granted by the police magistrate, and the police court having risen for that day, there appears to have been no power to admit the accused to bail. I am afraid this is not a case in which I could grant any compensation from any fund under my control.

REVENUE (GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND).

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any steps are being taken to ascertain the true revenue paid by Ireland and Great Britain respectively, in regard of articles which are consumed in one country and the duties on which are collected in the other; and, whether any steps are in contemplation to ascertain such true revenue, especially in respect of those articles which can be removed from one country to the other without official permit?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): No steps have been taken in the direction indicated by the right hon. Gentleman, and none are in contemplation, beyond the continuance of the returns as to the financial relations between England, Scotland and Ireland, which have in recent years been presented to Parliament. With regard to the adjustments of collected revenue made in those returns, I am advised that the figures relating to spirits are certainly, and those relating to beer probably, as accurate as they can be made. As to the other dutiable articles of consumption, notably tea, the figures cannot, I admit, be regarded with the same confidence. But no satisfactory means have yet been devised whereby greater accuracy could be obtained, without establishing such a watch over the movement of dutiable articles as would seriously hamper trade. Only one member of the recent Commission gave any countenance to such a suggestion. The proposed Commission will have before them the figures presented to their predecessors, and it will be open to them, if they are not satisfied with those figures, to suggest any practicable means for improving the basis on which the adjustments are made.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS (INDIA).

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state what has been done with reference to a memorial on the subject of the preservation of ancient monuments in India, which was presented to the Secretary of State for India on 13th July, 1894, on behalf of the Royal Academy of Arts, the Society of Antiquaries of London, the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, and the Royal Archæological Institute; and, whether he will lay upon the table of the House the correspondence which has taken place regarding this memorial?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: The Memorial cited in the hon. Baronet's question was forwarded in April, 1894, to the Government of India for their consideration. I am not aware what measures, if any, the Government of India have taken in consequence of the suggestions which it contains, but I will inquire, and will communicate the result to the hon. Member. At present the correspondence cannot be regarded as complete, but, when it is so, I will consider whether papers can be laid on the Table.

Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SALT DUTY (INDIA).

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that there is a very general feeling in India that the high duty on salt should be reduced for this year at least, in view of the sufferings of the poorer classes from famine, the loss of revenue caused thereby being included in the cost of famine relief; whether he is aware that such reduction can be effected by an executive order of the Government of India; and, whether he will direct the Government of India to issue such an order?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I am not aware that there is any general feeling in India that the salt duty should be reduced for one year. I may, on the contrary, point out that any such limitation of the period of reduction would be practically impossible, because, if an abatement for one year only were announced, enough salt for consumption during a very much longer period would undoubtedly be drawn out of bond or otherwise passed into stock within the year. The price of salt is now for the majority of the peeple of India lower than it was 20, 30, or 40 years ago, and the incidence of the duty is about 4½d. per head per annum. In these circumstances, although I feel most deeply for the sufferings which a large number of her Majesty's Indian subjects have been and are undergoing, I do not propose to issue any orders with regard to the salt duty.

ESTATES RETURN (IRELAND).

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the first return of estates, under Section 40 of the recent Land Act has yet been printed; and, if not, why not?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: The Return in question was laid on the Table on the 6th instant, and was ordered to be printed. It will, I hope, soon be circulated. The printing of the Return rests with the Stationery Office.

IRISH ACTS (CODIFICATION).

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is now prepared to state what the Irish Government propose to do in the matter of consolidating the Statute

Law so far as Acts applying to Ireland are concerned; and whether his attention has been drawn to the observations made by the Lord Chief Baron in the recent case of Barrett v. Harold as to the unsatisfactory condition of the Irish Poor Law Code in this respect?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: My attention has been called to the report of the Judgment of the Lord Chief Baron as published in the Freeman's Journal of the 7th inst., which contains no reference to the subject of codification. I have only to repeat the answers I gave to the hon. Member on the 21st and 22nd of January last in reference to this Question. The whole matter is still under the consideration of the Irish Government, but I cannot promise any legislation on the subject this Session, the more especially as several hon. Members from Ireland have announced their intention of raising controversial questions such as those relating to the Poor Law and Municipal Franchise and Rating on every available opportunity.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Am I to understand that the Irish Government admit no responsibility for the Government of Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: I don't wish the hon. Member to understand anything of the kind.

MATABELELAND AND MASHONALAND.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Pembroke and Haverfordwest (General LAURIE), I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state the number of Imperial and Colonial troops employed in suppressing the insurrection in Matabele and Mashonaland, what number respectively of Imperial troops were killed in action, wounded in action, and died from other causes; whether it is intended to recognise the gallantry shown and arduous service rendered by the troops engaged by the issue of any decoration; and whether he is able to state the total number of white settlers murdered in Matabele and Mashonaland during the insurrection?

MR. BRODRICK: The forces comprised 1,230 Imperial and 1,492 local troops. The casualties from all causes among the Imperial troops were 14 officers and 39 men. The Chartered Company have been granted permission to issue a medal for service in the campaign. The white settlers murdered or missing were, according to a return furnished by the Company, 258.

VETERINARY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin, St. Patrick (Mr. W. FIELD), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is intended this Session to give the promised grant in aid of establishing a Veterinary College in Dublin; and, whether he is aware that the charter has been ratified and guarantors secured, and that the governors are anxious to avoid further delay?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No grant-in-aid out of voted moneys was, so far as I am aware, ever contemplated or proposed for the establishment of a Veterinary College in Ireland. I have no funds at my disposal which could be utilised for this purpose otherwise than by legislation, which would certainly not be of a non-contentious character. The establishment of a Veterinary College would, in my opinion, be a matter proper for the consideration of a Board of Agriculture, such as it is proposed to create in the Bill now before the House.

BLACKROCK TOWNSHIP COMMISSIONERS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: On behalf of the hon. Member for Dublin, St. Patrick (Mr. FIELD), I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why the Treasury, through the Board of Public Works for Ireland, require a fine of about £1,752 in consideration of accepting from the Blackrock Township Commissioners repayment at three months' notice of the outstanding balance of their loans (amounting to £12,084) instead of receiving that repayment by instalments spread over a number of years, pursuant to the literal terms of the mortgages under which these loans were obtained, and which do not contain any such condition as that which the Board of Works are now seeking to impose; and, whether this is a condition introduced recently and since the Blackrock Township Commissioners borrowed any of the sums of money which they now seek to repay?

Mr. HANBURY: The sum mentioned is in no sense a fine, but merely the difference between the par value and the current market price of the Local Loans Stock. The Blackrock Commissioners have borrowed from the Board of Works, within the last nine years, various sums which it was distinctly stated in the mortgages, as the question admits, should be repaid by periodical instalments spread over 15 to 50 years. They ask to be allowed to break these contracts at a cost of nearly 15 per cent. of the capital value to the lenders—the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. In the case of all loans, whether in England, Scotland or Ireland, it has been the rule of the Treasury since the end of 1895 to protect the taxpayer by refusing to allow premature repayment at a price far below the market value of the stock.

LOUGHSHINNY PIER (CO. DUBLIN).

Mr. J. J. CLANCY (Dublin Co. N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the pier at Loughshinny, county of Dublin, has now for several years been left but half built; and whether any steps are to be taken, and if so, when, to complete that structure, an excellent foundation for the unfinished part of which already actually exists?

Mr. HANBURY: Prior to 1886 there existed at Loughshinny, County Dublin, only the ruins of a very ancient pier about 400 feet long. In that year the Fishery, Piers and Harbours Commissioners made a grant of the then available balance of the Sea Fishery Fund, namely, £1,899, together with a local contribution of £276 for the construction of a pier 120 feet long and of a boatslip and platform. These works were completed, and handed over to the Grand Jury of the County of Dublin in 1888. No proposal is before the Board of Works for increasing the length of the pier, nor have they any funds available for such a purpose.

Mr. Patrick O'Brien.

BALBRIGGAN HARBOUR.

Mr. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the condition of Balbriggan Harbour, which is such that if the harbour is not soon dredged it will become useless; and if so, whether he will use his influence with the Treasury in favour of a grant being made for the purpose of clearing it out?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: My attention does not appear to have been previously directed to the condition of Balbriggan Harbour, which, I am informed, is under the control of the Dublin Port and Docks Board. I could not, under the circumstances, recommend the Treasury to give a grant for the purpose of dredging the harbour.

LOCAL TAXATION RETURNS (SCOTLAND).

Mr. C. B. RENSHAW (Renfrew, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when the Annual Local Taxation Returns (Scotland), 1894–5, will be published?

*The LORD ADVOCATE: I am informed by the Local Government Board that the proofs of the Local Taxation Returns have now been received from the printers, but that the Memorandum and Summary is not yet quite ready. The matter will be pressed forward, and it is hoped that it will not now be long before the complete volume for 1894–5 will be issued.

POSTMEN (CORK).

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, could he explain why it is that Cork postmen are placed in the same scale of payment as the postmen of Limerick and Waterford, cities of only half the population, and in a lower scale than the postmen of several English cities with half the population; how many and what English towns and cities with a lower population than Cork are placed in a higher scale than that city; and whether there are any English cities and towns with the same population as Cork which are placed in the same scale?

*MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has received a memorial for better wages from the postmen at Cork, and as stated in a letter sent yesterday to the hon. Member, the subject is now under careful examination. A further communication shall be addressed to him as soon as possible. At such short notice the information desired by the hon. Member cannot be given to-day.

START BAY (REMOVAL OF SAND).

MR. F. B. MILDMAY (Devon, Totnes): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the action of the contractors for the naval works at Devonport in removing large quantities of sand from the shores of the Start Bay; whether he will hold a local inquiry upon the allegations as to damage to fishermen's cottages and to the fishing industry likely to result therefrom; and whether he will in the meantime prevent further action of the kind?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): The shores of Start Bay referred to by the hon. Member are under the control of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods and Forests, who have granted the contractors a licence to remove materials therefrom—but, at my suggestion, a provision was inserted in the licence to enable it to be determined at three months' notice. I will communicate with the Commissioners and cause inquiry to be made as to the likelihood of damage being caused by the removal of the sand.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGES (GRANT).

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Committee on University Colleges has reported on the allotment of the increased grant; and, if so, whether he is able to inform the House as to its future allocation?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The Committee has not yet reported, but I expect it will shortly do so.

ORDNANCE SURVEY (CO. MAYO).

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he could state when will the maps of the revised survey of the county of Mayo be all completed and published; of what parts of the county of Mayo will maps be published on the 25-inch scale; whether maps on the 6-inch scale will be also published for the whole county; and will maps of Ireland for the future be in every way brought up to the same standard as the English and Scotch maps?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I understand that the maps will be presented in the course of the Session.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT.

MR. JEFFREYS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state when he will introduce the promised Bill for the amendment of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I have been in consultation with my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board on this subject and I am afraid I cannot fix a day at present.

MIDWIVES' REGISTRATION ACT.

MR. WALTER HAZELL (Leicester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the Midwives' Registration Bill now waiting its Second Reading in this House; whether he is aware that the Bill carries out the unanimous recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on the subject, and that Bills with this object have been introduced time after time into Parliament, but that they have been dropped through failure to secure parliamentary time; and, whether in view of the large amount of mortality and widespread suffering both of mothers and of infants which the Committee report, the Government will give time during the present Session for the discussion of the Bill now before the House; and, if this be not possible, whether they can hold out hope of its being made a Government measure next Session?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: The hon. Gentleman asks me to give special facilities for the discussion of a private Bill. Without venturing to offer an opinion on the merits of the Bill, I must say this is a course the Government can hardly take at the present period of the Session.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION (SCOTLAND).

MR. T. C. H. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to introduce a Measure dealing with the subject of Private Bill legislation in Scotland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: As perhaps the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Secretary for Scotland is now introducing the Bill in the House of Lords.

MR. HEDDERWICK asked if the right hon. Gentleman would undertake that the Bill should be introduced in this House in time to enable it to have a fair chance of passing into law before the end of the Session?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: That would depend upon the general course of public business, with regard to which I cannot make a statement at present.

WALLACE BEQUEST (MANCHESTER HOUSE).

MR. W. F. B. MASSEY-MAINWARING (Finsbury, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the lease of Manchester House has been purchased by the Government; whether Lord Portman has been asked to sell to the Government the freehold of Manchester House; whether he has stated that, under certain circumstances, he is prepared to present the reversion of Manchester House to the Nation: and whether the Wallace Collections will be arranged in time so that the numerous Colonial visitors during the Jubilee week will have the opportunity of inspecting the said collections?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: As my hon. Friend is aware, a Committee has been appointed and is, I believe, actually sitting in connection with the course to be pursued as to this great public bequest. Until that Committee has reported I can hardly reply to the major part of the Question. I am informed with regard to one paragraph, however, that it would not be possible to throw the collection open to the public in the course of the next few weeks.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) asked whether there was any probability of the Committee reporting before the close of the present Session?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I have not made special inquiries, but I should anticipate that they would report before the close of this Session?

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

MR. MASSEY-MAINWARING: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if his attention has been drawn to a memorial by a large number of artists and others to the Education Ministers, praying that the completion of the South Kensington Museum frontage may be commenced; and if so, whether he will endeavour to procure the necessary funds for this purpose from the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: There is a Committee of the House investigating certain questions connected with the South Kensington Museum, and though it was quite true the primary object of that Committee is to deal with structural alterations or additions, I think we can hardly settle upon a plan dealing with the structure, seeing that it might require modification in consequence of the recommendations of that Committee.

MR. MUNDELLA asked the right hon. Gentleman whether, when he was last in office, plans were not called for by competition, a plan actually decided upon, and instructions given to proceed?

MR. G. C. T. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) inquired whether the late Chancellor of the Exchequer did not absolutely promise a grant to commence the building? ["Hear, hear."]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he must have notice of the Question put by the hon. Member for Islington. He was not acquainted with the facts the right hon. Gentleman had brought before them, but he would be surprised that the right hon. Gentleman's account was accurate, as during the three years he was in office nothing was done. [A laugh.]

GRECO-TURKISH WAR.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I do not know whether the First Lord of the Treasury can give the House any information as to whether an armistice has been arrived at between Greece and Turkey?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, Sir. I am afraid that I have no information to convey to the House. I did get private notice from the right hon. Gentleman a little after Five o'clock, but I know that he is very particular that an identic statement should be made in both Houses, and in order that that may be obtained I must have an opportunity of consulting the Foreign Secretary. On this occasion I have not had that opportunity. [Laughter and cheers.]

MR. J. MORLEY: I may say that I did not at all expect or ask the right hon. Gentleman to make an identic statement, but I should have been glad if he could have given any statement at all on a subject which is of great interest to the House and to the public. ["Hear, hear!"]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY asked the Leader of the House what the business was for next Thursday—whether the Budget would be taken—and also whether it would be convenient for him to take the South African Vote on Friday, the 21st?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I cannot give an absolute pledge as to Thursday, but I think it is very likely that the Budget will be taken. With regard to Friday week, I shall be very glad to meet the right hon. Gentleman's wishes, which, I understand, are the wishes also of the Leader of the Opposition and of the House generally. The South African Vote shall be put down first for that day.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) supposed that the Finance Bill would not be taken before Thursday.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he could not even give an absolute promise on that, but he thought it unlikely.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.) asked whether the second reading of the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill was absolutely fixed for Monday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY replied in the affirmative.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked if there was any intention of taking Supply to-night?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said that if they got as far as Supply he should propose to take it.

MR. WEIR desired to know whether the First Lord was now in a position to make any statement with regard to the introduction of the Bill for the congested districts of the Highlands and islands of Scotland?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he had no statement to make on the subject at present. He desired to add to his previous answer on the subject that in no case would the Finance Bill be taken to-night.

MR. J. P. FARRELL asked if the right hon. Gentleman had any statement to make with regard to the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he had not.

MOTION.

POST OFFICE (SITES).

Bill to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire lands in London, Brighton, Norwich, Plymouth, Southampton, Oban, and Cork for the public service, and to confirm agreements in relation to the Aldersgate public garden or postmen's park; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hanbury and Mr. Akers-Douglas; presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 251.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FOREIGN PRISON MADE GOODS BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon), moved: "That the Bill be now Read a Second time." He said the subject was not by any means a new one to the House. In 1895 the matter formed the subject of Debate on the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sheffield, "That it is incumbent upon Her Majesty's Government, in the interests of the industrial classes of the United Kingdom, at once to take steps t restrict the importation of goods made in foreign prisons by the enforced labour of convicts and felons." The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, who was then President of the Board of Trade, opposed the course proposed by his hon. and gallant Friend, and suggested, as an alternative to the Motion, the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the whole matter. The Debate showed very clearly that the House was not at all disposed to accept this alternative, and, in the result, the Motion was carried without a division. Thus the House of Commons, distinctly and without reserve, committed itself to the opinion that the Government should at once take steps to prevent the importation of these goods. The then Government, although they allowed the Motion to pass without a division, did not act either in the spirit or the letter of its terms. They did, in fact, the very thing which had been rejected by the House of Commons. They appointed a Committee, not, as had been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the member for Aberdeen, of the House of Commons, but a Departmental Committee "to inquire into the extent to which goods made in foreign prisons are imported into this country and to report whether any, and, if so, what, steps can be taken effectually to restrict the importation of such goods." It seemed to him that that was deliberately setting at naught the Resolution of the House of Commons. [Cheers.] The Committee reported to the effect that the quantity of such goods imported was not such as to injure British trade generally; that the evil results were confined to the importation of Belgian and German goods; that mat-making suffered slightly, and that the brush-making trade as a whole did not suffer any serious or lasting injury. He had never stated that the importation of these goods was a very large importation, nor had he ever said that the importation was a serious injury to their trade as a whole. [Opposition Cheers.] When they assumed Office they felt that, in view of the Resolution of the House of Commons, it was necessary that some steps should be taken with a view of endeavouring to carry it out. They did that which was suggested as a possible course in the Report of the Committee—received after they had assumed Office—and endeavoured to put an end to the grievance. They entered into negotiations and addressed communications to the four Powers who were mainly interested in the matter—Holland, Belgium, France, and Germany—with the object of endeavouring to arrange for some common action to stop the importation of these goods. The reply from France was to the effect that steps had been taken to utilise prison made goods with a view of stopping, or at least of diminishing, their exportation. Belgium replied that they could not undertake to prohibit their exportation; Prussia that they were restricting the manufacture more and more, hoping ultimately to abolish it; and Holland that the amount was very small, and that they could not assent to an international agreement. Though there was no reason to express dissatisfaction with the sympathetic tone of the replies, it was quite evident that there was no prospect of putting a stop to the importation of these goods by means of international agreement. The Government then had to consider whether they were justified in ignoring the Resolution of the House, and, in arriving at a conclusion upon that matter, they had to consider what was likely to be the action of the present House of Commons upon the subject. ["Hear, hear!"] He certainly had no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that if the House of Commons of 1895 arrived at such a Resolution there was every reason to expect that the existing House of Commons would be even more in favour of such legislation—[cheers]—and that, therefore, it was the duty of the Government to endeavour to give effect to the Resolution. The practical conclusion at which the Select Committee arrived was that the grievance was a small one and that British trade generally was not injured. [Ironical cheers.] That, however, was no consolation to a particular trade which was injured. [Cheers.] The Government had never said that the grievance was a large one, having regard to British trade as a whole; but they agreed with what the Commissioner of the Department of Labour in the United States said, that the difficulty "did not lie so much in quantity as in the effect occasionally and here and there upon price." What the House was asked to legislate upon was the question of principle and not quantity. [Ironical cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen seemed to be inclined to think that a Bill of this kind would be of little use. That was not the opinion of Belgium. He saw the other day a copy of an influential Brussels journal in which the question of this legislation was commented upon. It was Le Petit Bleu, and this is what it said:—

> "Public opinion in this country is much occupied with this Measure, which may have a serious effect upon Belgian trade. Owing to the extreme cheapness of these goods, England has been the principal market for articles manufactured in our prisons, and particularly in our penal settlements. That market once closed to a trade of this particular kind, the latter will necessarily begin to raise a serious and even a disloyal competition against the regular trade of Belgium, and our free workers producing under less favourable conditions, we shall witness the decline of a whole series of interesting small industries. . . . But now that exportation is soon to become impossible, the whole weight of competition will fall upon Belgium. All the products which used to be sent to England will load the Belgian market; the free employer who pays a day's wage of from 2f. 50c. to 3f. cannot contend against speculators who run the workshops of the penal settlements and pay wages which never exceed 40 centimes a day."

Hon. Gentlemen who jeered apparently had no objection to disloyal competition between convict-made Belgian-made goods and English free labour. [Cheers.] The proposal of the Bill was to add prison-made goods to the table of goods which were prohibited. That was the course which they found adopted both in Canada and the United States. The Canadian law prohibited "goods manufactured or produced wholly or in part by prison labour or made in connection with any prison, gaol or penitentiary." The United States law enacted that "goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labour shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is prohibited." It might be said, and with some justice, that there would be difficulty in applying the law. On that point he had consulted the Customs authorities, and they informed him that there would be no difficulty in applying the law if sufficient evidence be produced. [Laughter.] If the Bill passed it would be the duty of the Government to instruct our Consuls at foreign ports carefully to watch with a view to obtaining such evidence. Even assuming that the difficulties would be considerable, the mere existence of this legislation and the risk of confiscation would act as a deterrent in preventing such goods being sent. But, whether that were so or not, he was satisfied that in placing it upon record that this House would not tamely submit to the importation of prison-made goods to compete with the free labour of this country the Government were giving effect not only to the views of the House of Commons but of the immense bulk of the people of this country. [Cheers.] He should very much like hon. Gentlemen who were now endeavouring to minimise this Bill and were going to oppose it to go to any meeting of the working classes in any part of the country and advocate the admission of convict-made goods. ["Hear, hear!"] He had no doubt as to what the result would be.

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): Who is to tender the evidence?

*Mr. RITCHIE: Who is to supply the evidence? Those people who have got the evidence to supply. [Laughter and cheers.] The Customs authorities will be prepared to receive evidence from anyone who will come to them with facts respecting any particular shipment of goods which arrive in this country.

Mr. E. ROBERTSON: They can only take action upon evidence tendered.

*Mr. RITCHIE: Certainly. For the reasons he had adduced he commended the Bill to the attention of the House, and he had no doubt hon. Gentlemen would find that the opinion of the House of Commons in regard to it was in accord with that of the last House of Commons and the opinion of the great bulk of the people.

Mr. J. H. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) offered the Government his congratulations that at last, after two years of office, they had been able to find time for the consideration of that social and labour programme of which they heard so much during the General Election, and so little since. They might also congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on having performed a feat which he ventured to say was absolutely without precedent in Parliamentary history. The right hon. Gentleman, he supposed, was the first Minister who had ever asked the House of Commons to endorse a policy which a Committee appointed under the auspices of his own Department had not only declared against, but declared to be absolutely objectionable. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the courage he had shown in throwing over the men of tried experience and the public servants who had sat upon that Committee. But he must express his disappointment at both the time and the form of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the Resolution which the hon. Member for Central Sheffield passed during the last Parliament. He would remember that the whole allegation against the then Liberal Government during that Debate was that they would not at once stop the importation of prison-made goods. The difficulty of preventing the importation was pointed out, and the critics were challenged to say what their remedy was to be, and what was their reply? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), said:—

> "The thing is perfectly easy—give us the fees and we will give you the prescription."

Well, they had been in office two years, they had had the fees all that time, and this was the result. The statement then made that they had the prescription in their pocket appeared to have been a very fruitless one, for after they had been in office some time, it was found that the only prescription they had been able to use was a proposal to send post-cards to foreign Governments, and ask their co-operation. What did they ask the foreign Governments to do? They had the boldness, not only to ask them to deal with importations into this country, but also to set their own houses in order and stop the sale of prison-made goods even in their own countries—a matter which concerned them alone. The right hon. Gentleman must admit that the original intention of the Government had completely failed. The foreign Governments refused to co-operate, and the result was that the prescription of a bad doctor had to be set aside, and they had that night, not the prescription of the President of the Board of Trade, but the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Central Sheffield five years ago. Well, if anyone was entitled to congratulate himself that night, it was the hon. Member for Central Sheffield. Although the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had shown a warm affection for this Bill, he was not the real father—he was the step-father. The real legitimate father was the hon. Member for Central Sheffield, and he thought, after the progress the hon. Member had made in this matter, that any private Member might take heart and rest satisfied that, no matter how strong the opposition to his proposals might be at one particular time, he need never despair, if only he was persistent enough, of getting a Government weak enough to adopt his proposals. [Laughter.] Let them see what was the case presented in support of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman, he should have thought, would have come forward with some important statistics from his own Department: but what had he done? Instead of giving the House Board of Trade returns, he had given them a paragraph from an obscure Belgian newspaper. Well, he knew that the Government were in the habit of going to Germany and other places for other portions of their policy, but he was surprised that they should find it necessary to go abroad for a justification of this particular Bill. The right hon. Gentleman gave them no statistics in favour of the Bill, because there were none to give. All the statistics he could give would be against the passing of the Bill. But what did the right hon. Gentleman say about the Bill himself? He confessed that, while listening to the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, he wondered whether he was moving the rejection or the passing of the Bill. His whole speech seemed to be a speech against the Bill. Because what did he say? He said this was a grievance which was not large or serious.

*Mr. RITCHIE: What I said was that it was not large or serious relatively to the trade of the country as a whole.

Mr. DALZIEL: If the right hon. Gentleman said that, it was hardly necessary to say it at all—it was so obvious. The grievance was certainly not large or serious, as he should be able to show. The right hon. Gentleman laid the whole case for the Bill on the Resolution passed by the late Parliament. Of course, he was perfectly justified in taking that view, but it was a new departure for the Government of the day to base the justification of its policy on a Resolution passed at the fag-end of a long sitting. The right hon. Gentleman admitted there would be difficulty in applying the law, if passed. He was safe in making that admission, because it was absolutely impossible, in his judgment, to make the Bill effective as it stood at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman had failed to show that any particular trade was suffering from the importation of foreign prison-made goods. Why? Because he could not. They had heard a great deal about the brush-making trade. What were the facts as to that trade? Ten years ago 14,000 people were employed in the brush-making trade in this country. At the present time the number was 17,000—an increase of 20 per cent., while the increase of the population had been only 8 per cent., and the trade societies were as complete in membership as ever. These were clear proofs that the brush-making industry had not suffered. The importation of foreign-made brushes amounted in value to £40,000 a year. If they made a liberal allowance, and said that one-half of these brushes were made in prison, and took the cost of labour at one-third, they had a sum of from £6,000 to £7,000 as representing the whole question of importation in this trade. The leading brush manufacturers had testified that this question did not concern them in the slightest degree. They could make better brushes, and put them on the market at the same prices as those quoted by the agents for the foreign goods, and the trade was rapidly growing. Yet in the face of such facts they were asked to pass a Bill dealing with an imaginary evil by applying an impracticable remedy. In the mat-making industry, also, they found that there were more men employed than ever, while the unions, such as they were, showed a larger membership. In the face of facts like this, the Government had absolutely failed to make out any case for the Bill. Further, there had been no public demand for the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman could have done so, he would have quoted resolutions by the dozen from all parts of the country. He doubted whether he could have mustered more than half-a-dozen. True, the Trades Union Congress did pass a resolution on one occasion in favour of the Bill—["hear, hear!"]—but that was some years ago. He did not think the resolution had ever made its appearance since, and he should be surprised, indeed, if the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Gentlemen opposite were going to pass the Bill upon that solitary resolution. So little interest was manifested that the mover and seconder of the resolution and the Trade Congress never replied to the letter from the Committee inviting them to give evidence. Advertisements were inserted in 12 of the leading papers of the country inviting people who suffered from the importation of prison-made goods to give evidence, and only two persons came forward. Subsequently advertisements were inserted in 19 provincial papers, and these only produced one witness. ["Hear, hear!"] But was the Bill effective for its purpose? Evidence was to be tendered to the Commissioners of Customs that goods imported had been made in a foreign prison. Who was to give the evidence? Did the Government expect the consumer to come forward and complain that he got his goods too cheaply, or that the Germans were taxing themselves for his benefit? After these goods had passed through half-a-dozen hands, how was anyone to prove that they were prison-made? And if it were proved, was it fair that the last holder, who might be totally ignorant of the origin, should risk forfeiture? ["Hear, hear!"] No firm in this country would waste time or money in sniffing after goods made in foreign prisons; and what an agreeable duty to impose on our representatives abroad! The only person whose interest it would be to give evidence would be a rival importer; and while his allegation (perhaps anonymous) was being inquired into, the goods would be kept back and trade would be disturbed. The evidence in the Merchandise Marks Committee showed that all these restrictions were decreasing trade, and the House ought to be careful how they multiplied such restrictions. ["Hear, hear!"] The whole case for this Bill was that the brush-making industry was suffering. But how could the Government stop there? Every trade which was injured by unfair foreign competition had the same claim to protection. Was foreign sugar or Argentine beef to be stopped because its producers received a bounty from their Government? If this Bill was not protection, what was? It was simply to compel the consumer to pay more for brushes in the interest of the brushmakers. He could understand the hon. Member for Central Sheffield supporting the Bill, because he wished to extend its restrictions to all foreign-made goods. But was that the view of the President of the Board of Trade? Or was the right hon. Gentleman only the companion in arms of the hon. Member for the moment only? ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman would find it very difficult to get rid of the hon. Member for Sheffield, to whom the passing of this Bill would be an encouragement to persevere. [Laughter.] The President of the Board of Trade did not rely so much on the operation of the Bill itself as on the fear which foreign Governments would have of it. It required a stretch of the imagination to conceive any foreign Government being afraid of this Bill. [Laughter.] No cause had been shown for it; it embodied a violation of the settled policy of the country for the last 50 years; and it did not achieve the object which the Government professed to have in view. ["Hear, hear!"] It was a bogus Bill [cheers]—brought forward, not in the interest of the consumer, but as a Party manœuvre to redeem pledges which ought not to have been made. [Cheers.] Its object was to tickle the ears of a certain section of the working classes in this country, who entertained a prejudice in this matter. [Ironical Ministerial cheers.] Surely it was not the duty of a strong Government to encourage a false prejudice; and it was not fair to take advantage of a depression in trade and induce working men to believe that it resulted from the competition of foreign prison-made goods. He begged to propose to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

*MR. T. P. WHITTAKER (York, W.R., Spen Valley) seconded the Motion for the rejection of the Bill, because he regarded the Bill as an insidious attack upon the free trade policy of the country. ["Hear, hear!"] The real objection to goods made in prison was that they were cheap, and, being cheap, they competed with goods manufactured in this country. The fact that they were made in prisons did not matter at all. If the people of this country suffered from the importation of cheap goods, then cheapness was the evil, and it mattered not where those cheap goods were made. That the goods now in question were made in prisons was merely an excuse for an attack on the policy of free trade. If the principle of the Bill were carried to its logical conclusion the importation of all goods competing with labour and production in this country should be prohibited. Why not deal in the same way with jewellery, paper, toys, laces, silk goods, woollen clothing from Germany; French gloves; American and Swiss watches; glassware and prints? ["Hear, hear!"] It was no consolation to a man thrown out of work by the importation of some foreign article to tell him that that article was not made in a prison. The real grievance and difficulty was that the man was out of work, and, if that were a sufficient justification for the prohibition of the importation of goods made in prison, it was sufficient to justify the prohibition of the importation of all classes of foreign-made goods. ["Hear, hear!"] If the competition of imported goods was an evil everyone that suffered from it should be protected; but if it were not an evil, then no one should be protected from it. It might be said that the great objection was to foreign labour in prisons. He assumed that sweated labour on the Continent was more objectionable; and there was no proposed Bill to protect the working men of this country from that class of labour. ["Hear, hear!"] Again, if it was unreasonable to allow competition by the prison labour of other countries, it was just as unreasonable to allow competition by the prison labour of this country. Prisoners must be employed for their own benefit and, as a consequence, for the benefit of the community. The labour must be useful labour, for if it were otherwise it would be degrading; and, being useful labour, it must necessarily compete with the free labour of the country, even though the articles thus produced were not sold in the open market. If our prisoners produced something useful which would otherwise be produced by people outside, then our prison labour was competing with our free labour. But hon. Gentlemen opposite had not the courage to carry their principles to their logical conclusion. Again, if the importation of goods was to be forbidden because the conditions under which they were made were unsatisfactory, and little or nothing was paid for the labour employed; then carpets were made in Asia under very objectionable conditions, and they should prohibit the importation of articles made by our fellow subjects in India, where labour was paid at probably the lowest rate in the world. In fact, the whole principle of the Bill was unsound, and could not be defended from any point of view. He felt that this protective policy, this policy of interfering with trade, this policy of worrying industries at every stage had gone very much too far already. They had been making fools of themselves in connection with the Merchandise Marks Act. They had been advertising the foreign manufacturer too much. The mere passing of the Bill would be an announcement to the mat and brush buyers of the world that they need not come to England to purchase them cheaply, because those articles could be bought cheaper elsewhere. This policy of endeavouring to create work by keeping foreign-made goods out of the country was a great mistake. He contended that the importation of cheap articles was a benefit to the masses of the people of the country; and that it did not throw people out of employment. When the hon. Member for Central Sheffield moved a Resolution on foreign prison-made goods a few years ago he flourished before the House a foreign prison-made brush, which he said could be bought for sixpence, whereas if it had been made by English labour it could not be bought for less than a shilling; and the hon. Member argued that that was a very great injustice to the working men of this country. He ventured to assert that the importation of that brush to be sold at sixpence, which would otherwise cost one shilling, was a boon and a blessing to this country. If a man had to pay a shilling for a brush which he could get for sixpence, he would have sixpence less to spend on other articles. It was the common-sense teaching of experience that if they made an article dear it would be bought less frequently than when it was cheap. That would mean that there would be less employment for the people. He entered into an argument to show that the importation of those sixpenny brushes meant more employment for the people as well as the advantage of a wider use of brushes. The competition of prison labour was not, and never would be, serious. Prison labour was not cheap, it was dear; it was inefficient and not properly-trained labour. The evidence before the Committee on this point was conclusive, and the fact that the right hon. Gentleman could not bring forward any weighty statistics as to the injury which had been done showed that this was very largely an imaginary grievance. The competition of the free labour even of Belgium was far more serious than the competition of the prison-made article. The fact was it was the custom in this country for both employers and workmen to assume that an article was prison-made simply because it was cheaper than one that they could make. It was curious and interesting that this particular agitation had been set on foot by the European agent of an American firm. Evidence was given by brush makers before the Committee to show that by the adoption of improved machinery they could produce brushes vastly cheaper than those made in foreign prisons. It was free competition that led to the adoption and use of machinery, and it was by the development of machinery and by inventions that we must look to maintain our position in the commercial world. It had been given in evidence that the brush trade of this country had doubled in volume during the last ten years, and that the number of people employed in the brush and mat industry had increased far more rapidly than had the population. The Committee, which had before it the evidence of experts, reported against legislation in this matter as being impracticable and useless, and it must be evident to everybody who read the Bill that it was an unworkable scheme which was proposed. In the result trade would be harassed. It was impossible to trace where goods came from except from information obtained by trade rivals spying upon each other, and such a system would not be reputable. The Custom House authorities could only be put in motion by other people. He asked the House to show some backbone with reference to our great Free Trade policy, which had done more to develop our prosperity during the last 60 years than anything else, and not to allow it to be nibbled away by litle Bills of this kind.

*SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) expressed his gratitude to his right hon. Friend for having taken this early opportunity of giving effect to the Resolution of the House of February 19, 1895. A very large proportion of those on that side of the House had at the General Election pledged themselves to do all they possibly could to give effect to that Resolution. It was true that the right hon. Member for Aberdeen on that occasion offered a Committee to consider the Resolution, a proposal which was received with laughter by both sides of the House. His right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham in the course of a very interesting speech said, in reply to the right hon. Gentleman:—

> "In presence of the universal demand from the constituencies, and an admission by the official head of the Department, we are asked to take a Committee. No, Sir; in that respect we are not the comrades of the hon. Member for West Ham."

Mr. T. P. Whittaker.

After upwards of two months' delay the right hon. Member for Aberdeen appointed a Departmental Committee to consider this matter, and, although he would not challenge the constitution of that Committee, he could only say from his experience of it that it was carefully selected from the right hon. Gentleman's point of view. [Cries of "Oh!"] After 13 witnesses had been examined, and after they found that they were unable by any means to hasten the proceedings of the Committee, Colonel Bridgeman and himself felt compelled to resign their membership of it. The Report which was subsequently made stated that two trades only, the brush and mat making trades, made serious complaint of injury; that in the case of the former trade the allegations were not sustained, and in the case of the latter the injury was found to be very slight. He did not hesitate to say that that opinion of the five Members of the Committee who so reported was not justified by the evidence which was given. The President of the Masters' Cocoa Nut Fibre and Mat Association, however, said: "Many of the former workers are in a state of destitution"; the President of the United Cocoa Nut Matting and Matmakers Society, "Half of the matmakers are now out of the trade, and can get no employment at all"; the Secretary of the Society of Operative Brushmakers, "Ruin practically stares us in the face"; Mr. Thornton, Progressist member of the London County Council, and brush manufacturer, "There is a strong feeling among, not only masters, but men, that the competition of foreign prison labour with free labour in England is unfair"; the Secretary of the Manchester Branch of the United Society of Brushmakers, "During the last three years the competition of foreign prison-made goods has been most severely felt, we only ask to be protected against criminals"; and the Glasgow Branch, "The brush industry of this country will be destroyed." Hon. Members might say it was only a question of the mat makers and the brush makers, but if they would read the report sent to the Government by Mr. Tower, second Secretary of H. M.'s Embassy in Berlin, who had made inquiry into prison labour in Germany, they would see that almost every trade was admitted to German prisons, and there was no industry in this country which, if not threatened, might not be threatened by this unfair competition in the near future. Speaking on February 19, 1895, in that House, the right hon. Member for West Birmingham said:—

> "What will happen in the brush trade is that nobody will be able to make a profit, no workman will get decent wages. The Germans have sent over to this country for models of English manufactures, that they may reproduce such articles in their prisons. At the present time they are thus making some 20 different articles, and when they have fully ruined the English trade in these, they, no doubt, will be prepared to go on with 20 others. The simple fact is that no industry will be safe so long as this state of things is allowed to continue."

What was true in 1895 was even truer now. The resolution of the Trades Union Congress, in denunciation of the importation of prison-made goods, had been referred to. It was the agitation of the Trades Unions against the unfair competition of prison labour with free labour which had led successive Governments to put a stop to the competition in English prisons, and he asked whether it was fair, right, or proper, when the labour in English prisons was stopped that goods made in foreign prisons should compete with free labour in England. The employment of foreign prisoners was no concern of ours; the employment of English prisoners did concern us. It was absolutely incumbent on the Government of this country, having stopped the competition of English prison labour with free labour, to protect English working man from unfair competition coming from foreign countries. As to the amount of the competition, the report of Mr. Towers, dated June 20, 1894, and presented to Parliament in January last, clearly showed that a daily average of 29,200 prisoners in Prussia, Bavaria, Baden, and the Thuringian States were employed in work which eventually reached outside trade, and that in Prussia alone 8,296 prisoners were employed in cigar manufacture, machine knitting, basket weaving and cane furniture making, cardboard work and fancy paper making, cocoa matting making, button making, lamp making, etc., wood carving, toy making, picture frame making, iron ware making, copper ware making, and miscellaneous factory work. In Germany the production of prison labour was not allowed to be sold within a radius of the prison of origin; and in Belgium it could not be sold so as to compete with free labour. The bulk of prison-made goods then came to England—the only market which condescended to admit them. Steps had been taken in the United States not to admit them there. With regard to the practicability of restrictive legislation and of enforcing it, Mr. Charles Follett, C.B., for 17 years Solicitor to Her Majesty's Customs, gave most valuable evidence on this head. He said:—

> "The prohibition of prison-made goods, if it were agreed upon, would be nothing new. There are several classes of goods prohibited. Prohibition is a long-standing thing. I should have no difficulty in drawing a Bill in the sense of my views supervised by the Parliamentary counsel. I should consider it a feasible and effectual way, as the best means of preventing these goods coming in, would be to require that prison-made goods should be prohibited, and that the classes of goods which are believed to be made in foreign prisons should be, from time to time, specified by Customs regulations with Treasury approval. I should not think it would put any serious drawback on trade. It would soon cure itself. Although my experience during the past 17 years has been in a certain sense theoretical and legal, I am in a position to know the practical working and carrying out of all Customs laws and regulations."

Surveyor General R. T. Churchill said:—

> "I have been nearly 40 years connected with the Out-door Customs Department, and I have passed through its different grades, examining and clearing goods. I am thoroughly acquainted with the administrative machinery. I have heard the evidence given by the solicitor to the Customs, and his general views as to the feasibility of drafting a practical Measure to prevent the importation of prison-made goods. I have no reason to dissent from any of these views. I generally concur. It is certainly my opinion that the importation of prison-made goods is injurious to the manufacturing and labour interests in this country, and should, in my opinion, be stopped if possible."

Therefore the remedy suggested by the President of the Board of Trade on behalf of the Government would go a long way to deal with the mischief. If the Bill did not go far enough its supporters could come to Parliament to strengthen it. The importation of foreign prison-made goods began in a small way and had gone on increasing. Some years ago the importation of foreign prison-made brushes was so small that the record of it was abandoned, but latterly it had increased 700 per cent., and the imports amounted to £40,000 a year. It was the duty of the House to take care of every trade and industry. The brush and mat trades were specially injured, and there was no reason why they should not receive protection. He earnestly urged every Member of the House to give his hearty support to the Bill. Although it might not be sufficient, at any rate it would do something to cure an evil which was recognised by the working men of every trade in all parts of the country, and he thanked the President of the Board of Trade and the Government for having done that which the late Government failed to do, and that was to give effect to the unanimous Resolution of the House of Commons in the last Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"]

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER, after the usual interval,

MR. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who last addressed the House complained of the delay of the late Government in this matter. He should have thought hon. Gentlemen opposite would have been wise to avoid that topic. The hon. and gallant Gentleman complained that the right hon. Member for Aberdeen caused a delay of two months, but the Government which the hon. and gallant Gentleman supported had been guilty of a delay of two years. He purposed briefly to show what the present Government had done in the matter. In the first place they entered into communication with four European Governments and the Government of the United States, suggesting that they should enter into an international agreement to exclude prison-made goods from both the home and foreign markets. That did seem to him to be a very wild-goose chase. That request was absolutely impracticable, and it would be unjust to the intelligence of the Government to suppose that they thought the other Powers would comply with it. However much two of those Powers might have been inclined to comply, there was a constitutional difficulty which would prevent them—he meant the Germanic Empire and the United States—in those two countries the question was a State question and not a Federal question.

*MR. RITCHIE said that that course was suggested by the Committee.

MR. PICKERSGILL said that was not the case. The Committee referred to the great practical difficulty in the way of carrying such an agreement into effect, and added that the question whether it should be encountered was for the Government and not for the Committee to decide. He did not think the action of the Government was altogether prudent, and in view of the answers they had received to their communications, he was surprised they should still consider it necessary to legislate. The answers received from most of the Powers were not only friendly in their tone, but as far as the main question was concerned, decidedly favourable. Then, Germany was not able to answer for all the States of the Empire, but the Prussian Government said that it was intended to restrict prison-made goods more and more, and that they hoped to abolish it entirely. He did think the Government ought to acknowledge the extremely friendly way in which foreign Governments had received the communications. They had agreed to act as our own Government acted with regard to prison-made goods. They would so use them as to do no injury to anyone. He should like to know how any hon. Member of that House could distinguish a case of prison-made goods from other goods. There was no intention on the part of any foreign Government to injure England, and grounds of complaint had been largely diminished, if they had not been entirely removed. Then he came to the Bill. He never saw a Bill drawn like this. The right hon. Gentleman had expatiated upon the moral effect of enacting the prohibition of goods made in foreign prisons. Why, this Bill did not prohibit such goods. ["Hear, hear!"] It prohibited goods which, by the evidence tendered, were shown to be made in prison. There was an unconscious humour about this for which he did not give the right hon. Gentleman credit. He did not think that a lawyer had drawn the Bill. He rather thought that it had the Birmingham mark upon it. How was proof to be given?

To the Customs Department, so that they could act upon it? They might prove that the original consignor used prison-made goods, or labour, but if he employed other labour outside for producing the same class of goods who could distinguish between the two? ["Hear, hear!"] How in the world could they distinguish a particular bale of goods as made by prisoners and not by free labour? This Bill did not at all carry out the recommendations made to the Committee. The hon. Member referred to Mr. Follett, but he was not responsible for this Bill. What Mr. Follett would have proposed was not that Bill. Mr. Follett proposed to throw upon the importer the duty of proving that the goods were not prison-made. That was the way in which a lawyer would draw a Bill, but this Bill proposed to do everything against which Mr. Follett warned them. They had the experience of the Merchandise Marks Act. Out of the thousands of cases which came under that Act very few indeed had been seized on information; not 1 per cent. He did not hesitate to say that this was a bogus Bill. [Cheers.] He did not believe that the Government thought it a workable Bill. It was like some Bills introduced into the Chamber at Washington which everyone knew were never intended to be acted upon. He would rather pass a bad Bill than a Bill like this, which the promoters knew would not be workable. As to prison labour, so long as they took care that it was spread over a number of industries it could not do any appreciable injury to the working classes, and he should be ashamed of the British workman if he disputed the right of the criminal to be employed. ["Hear, hear!"] It was wise, just, and merciful to employ the criminal in useful labour. They had been threatened with the resentment of the workmen if they opposed this Bill. He was not afraid of his constituents. He had a large constituency of working men, and he had not the least fear of offending them by voting against that Bill, because he thought the reasonable working man would see that this Bill was a sham, and that it was a red herring drawn across the track.

Mr. JOHN BURNS (Battersea), as the representative of a working-class constituency, maintained that if constituencies containing working men were consulted now, when trade was fairly good, and were not subject either to the cry of the unemployed or to the bogus plaint of designing politicians, who had no other claim to represent them than their capacity to draft bogus Bills and get up artificial cries about tooth brushes being made in Belgium and eye-glasses in Japan, he believed that even in Sheffield the hon. Member would lose his case by a proportion of 20 to 1. When, however, this question was mixed up with Home Rule, alien immigration and grants to Voluntary Schools, its effect was lost sight of, and the constituencies voted on the major question, while taking for granted the minor but not less important questions. He asked the hon. Member for Sheffield to give the date of the Resolution and the speeches when the Trade Union Congress voted in favour of this Bill. The only time when the question of prison labour was argued out on its merits was at Belfast in 1893. A Motion was made condemning the competition of British prison labour with British free labour; but the Resolution was opposed by men who represented some of the trades alleged to be claiming the passing of this Bill. The Motion was unanimously rejected by the Congress. He pointed out that under the Bill there would be great difficulty in detecting what were and what were not prison-made goods. Were the prison-made goods to be labelled? Goods made in prisons would be taken to the port from which they were going to be sent. They might be labelled, which he doubted; but long before they reached the port and were sent to this country the labels might be changed, and then it might be convenient for the free labour products to bear the prison label while the prison-made goods might be marked as made either in Belgium or Germany, but not as having been made inside a prison. The quantity of prison-made goods was indeed very small, not sufficient to warrant the introduction of a Measure like this, while the quality was invariably bad. The proportion of prison-made goods was diminishing. France was restricting it and confining it to hand labour; Belgium had pledged itself to have no machinery employed in the prisons; Germany had promised to confine it to non-competitive industries. He had visited 15 of the largest prisons in the United States, and there they were confining the prison trade to new non-competitive work. The United States prisoners were hired out to contract; they were not engaged in making the article from the raw material up to the finished state. On the ground of cheapness there was not much reason for the introduction of the Bill. If by the Bill the Government labelled or identified these goods, they affirmed to the English people the low-water mark of cheapness and dragged English competition down to the lowest possible limit, and by that means caused ruin to trade not only at home but abroad. If cheapness was the reason for the Bill, why did not the Government include corn, machinery, textile articles from India, and jute? The Government knew well that they dared not do this. Every workman in England, Belgium, or Germany would be only too pleased to know that the best way to get a man out of prison and to keep him in an honest path was to provide him with a decent means of employment in making useful articles, and that this was the best agency for reducing crime. But if the Bill was passed the tendency would be to restrict prisoners to the picking of oakum, in digging a hole here and filling it up there, to the punishment of the treadmill and to other demoralising forms of punishment. He had been in prison, and he knew quite well what would be the effect of this silly proposition in England if universally applied. It would mean that when masons were out of work and were clamouring for harbours and breakwaters to be made, the prisoners at Portland would have to be stopped from working. To its credit, England had stuck bravely to Free Trade; it had done so to such an extent that Lord Salisbury, who generally spoke straight—[Ministerial cheers]—stated the other day that any man who advocated a going back to Protection would be a fool. [Cries of "No!"] Well, if he did not say that, he implied it. But this Bill was an attempt to introduce the doctrine of Protection, and they had selected the trade of a people who were the least prejudicially affected by foreign competition.

*Sir HOWARD VINCENT: Is not trade unionism a protection of labour?

Mr. BURNS said that trade unionism was a protection of labour inasmuch as it demanded a living wage, a maximum number of hours, decent Factory Acts, and sanitary conditions, and over and above that it believed in fair play for a free people in the free production of interchangeable commodities. He did not believe the British workman feared competition to the extent alleged; certainly he did not in the mat and brush-making trade. And if that competition did prejudicially affect to the extent of demanding the attention and interposition of the House of Commons, he would ask that the interference should be applied, not to 300 or 400 men whose trade had not been diminished, but to half a million of men in the textile trades, three-quarters of a million of men engaged in the coal trade, half a million of men engaged in the engineering trade, and the million and a quarter of men engaged in agriculture. He never heard a weaker case presented by a Minister of the Crown on behalf of a Bill than that made out by the President of the Board of Trade on behalf of this Bill. If they wanted to employ the unemployed, let them do away with the pluralists, assimilate the Factory and Sanitary Acts, and apply them in India and all over the Crown colonies. Why bring in a paltry bogus Bill like this? This was a brutal and an inhuman Bill, a Bill which no one who had had the slightest experience of the treatment of criminals in this or any other country could justify. No doubt this House would pass the Second Reading. It seemed to him that this House was capable of committing any folly in the direction of Protection, though sometimes it had a lucid interval. It did happen that at times the constituencies were humbugged and chloroformed by Bills of this description, but he believed that when they thoroughly understood this Measure, their verdict would be that the Government wanted Protection, but had not the courage to apply it to every industry. A permanent injury had been done to British trade by the marking of foreign-made goods. This was a mischievous Bill, and on that ground he should vote against it.

Mr. CUTHBERT QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury) said that, as the representative of a large number of men engaged in one of the industries which it was sought by this Bill to protect, he cordially supported the Measure. He was as good a free trader as the hon. Member for the

Spen Valley Division, but that should not prevent him rising to say that the men whom he represented felt it was a hardship to them that mats and matting made in the penal colonies of Belgium should be allowed to be imported into this country without any restrictions whatever. The hon. Member for Battersea spoke strongly of the attitude of the Trade Union Congress upon this matter. He had had the honour and privilege of conferring with trade union leaders on this matter, and he was thankful to say that after eight or nine years' hard work, and with the cordial assistance and wise counsel of those leaders, he succeeded in impressing the then Government with the propriety of discontinuing the unfair practice of contracting with prison labour in our own prisons. The consequence was that his constituents and their wives and families were starving.

*MR. SPEAKER said he must remind the hon. Member, as he had reminded another hon. Member, that the question was not the employment of criminals in English prisons, but the importation of goods made in prisons abroad.

MR. QUILTER said he would obey Mr. Speaker's ruling at once, but would like to explain that he was going to point out that, having been a consistent advocate of their protection against prison labour in this country, it was quite natural he should press that position to its logical conclusion, and support the Government in now doing away with what they had found to be unfair in their own country. He could not conceive how any Gentleman, even on the opposite side of the House, could regard that to be fair in Belgium which was admitted to be unfair in this country. The result of the manufacture of these mats in the Belgian penal colonies was that the English market was flooded with them, and it was impossible for their workers to live. If the late President of the Board of Trade had been in his place, he would like to have reminded him of the many occasions on which he had brought this matter to his attention, and of the several occasions on which he said that if there was a case at all for this Committee, or for legislation on the subject, it was the case of the mat weavers, especially in the district he represented. It was said what a small affair this was in the whole trade of the country, but it was the day of small things. It was the people who attended to small things who won in the end. They had had too much legislation on a grand scale—too much interference with everybody's property, and too much upsetting of everybody's business. What they wanted was to put everything in order, and to try and undo, as far as they could, the mischief which had been done in the three years of the preceding Parliament. He thought it spoke well for the business-like qualities of the Government, and especially of the President of the Board of Trade, and the Colonial Secretary, that they had not thought it beneath them to try and remove the grievance of a small number of people. He thought the Bill should have received the support of the Labour representatives. The Labour representatives in Belgium were far more alive to the interests of their constituents than were the Labour Members in his country, for when they found out that these prison-made mats were underselling the free labour of that country, they put such pressure on their Parliament that they were obliged to take measures to stop it. He implored the Government to stand firm to the proposal they had made, and to do their best to see that the Belgian prison labour was treated in exactly the same way as prison labour was treated in this country. As to the carrying out of the Bill, he would deal with the question in a very simple way. He would put the onus on the importer. He would make him answerable for not selling in this country as free labour goods articles made in foreign prisons, and he thought that would very soon have the desired effect.

MR. E. ROBERTSON said he was inclined to think that the true defence of this Bill had yet to come. The authorship of the Bill had been imputed to the hon. and gallant Member for Sheffield, and he understood he accepted the soft impeachment without demur. It had also been imputed to the right hon. Gentleman who introduced it, but there was another right hon. Gentleman on that Bench who, he imagined, would by-and-bye give the true defence of the Bill, and an explanation of it such as they had not yet had from that side of the House. The President of the Board of Trade convinced them that his heart, at all events, was not in the work he had to do. He was an old and experienced Member and Minister. He had had to pilot many difficult Bills in that House, and on many occasions he had distinguished himself by the success with which he had discharged his functions as Minister; but he had never heard him resort to such arguments as he had resorted to that night. His main argument in support of the Bill was that the Government was bound to obey a mandate, not of that House, but of the preceding House. He had never heard that before held out as a principle of Ministerial action. Why, a Motion carried by a private Member on a Friday night was by universal consent of the Leaders treated as one which might be ignored. If the right hon. Gentleman and his colleagues were going to accept as mandates all the Resolutions passed by the last Parliament they would have their hands full. The President of the Board of Trade gave himself away at the very beginning by admitting that the grievance, if any, was a small one. The right hon. Gentleman's chief piece of evidence was a quotation from a Belgian newspaper of which he never heard before. What was the date of the article?

*MR. RITCHIE: March 15.

MR. E. ROBERTSON asked the question because he could not gather from the extract that the writer had ever seen this Bill or was referring to it; if he was he was very easily alarmed. There were two main questions—Was this thing worth doing at all, and secondly, was this the way to do it? On the first question he was not a bitter opponent of the principle—[Ministerial laughter and cheers]—whether as against home prison or foreign prison produce he had no great objection to ordinary, free, non-criminal labour being protected. But the language of the President of the Board of Trade was very different from the mighty thing made of this grievance by the Secretary of State for the Colonies last year, and by every Unionist candidate at the last election.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Will the hon. Gentleman kindly quote the words in which I made a "mighty thing" of this last year?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I refer the right hon. Gentleman to his whole speech. [MR. CHAMBERLAIN: "Oh!"] I appeal to those who heard him that I am not giving an unfair account of the speech. [MR. CHAMBERLAIN: "I deny it!"] One of the right hon. Gentleman's expressions, as reported in the "Parliamentary Debates," was:—"There is no industry which is safe if this thing continued." [Cheers.] Was not that making a mountain out of a molehill? [Cries of "No!"] That sentence was characteristic of the whole speech. The main question, however, upon which comparatively little had been said was—Was this the right way to do it? Goods proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Customs by evidence tendered to them, to have been made or produced wholly or in part in any foreign prison, gaol, house of correction, or penitentiary, were to be added to the table of restrictions and prohibitions in Section 42 of the Act of 1876. This addition was entirely out of line with the category therein set forth. In every prohibition in that category, a plain, imperative duty was laid on the Commissioners of Customs. But here the Commissioners of Customs were to take no action unless they were set in motion by somebody who tendered evidence to them that the goods had been made in prison. He invited the hon. Member for Sheffield (Sir H. Vincent), who was the father of this whole legislation, to consider the sham his Leaders were palming off upon him. How the Commissioners were to satisfy themselves, what the procedure to be adopted—all this was left in nubibus in the Bill, and he declared that to offer such a thing as this Bill to so loyal a supporter of the Government as the hon. Member for Sheffield and his hon. Friend below the Gangway was to play upon their credulity. If they were to have these things prohibited, they should be prohibited in some effective way. Something might be said for the plan of the hon. Member below the Gangway, but for this proposal to be made by a strong Government which condescended to deal with small things was an experiment that ought not to be made. The Bill had been well described as a bogus Bill—a sham Bill. Apparently the Government were willing in this case, as they had not been willing in more important things, to accept Amendments; and while he did not approve the Bill in its present shape at all, if it was carried through the Second

Reading he should certainly consider himself free to strengthen the back of the right hon. Gentleman by withdrawing this condition about tendering evidence, and putting upon him and his subordinates the duty and responsibility of prohibiting goods when they came within the prohibition clause. ["Hear, hear!"] They now had the prescription for which they had waited two long years. Was that a policy—that? [Laughter.] Goods were to be prohibited, not because they were prison-made, but because evidence might be tendered which might prove to the satisfaction of the Commissioners for the time being that they were prison-made. It was a policy that was not worth the name. He did not know whether this was the prescription of a regular practitioner or not, but it was a prescription that would justify one in applying strong epithets to the author, and if this was all they had to expect from a Government of social programmes on a matter which was regarded as of so much importance two years ago, then the sooner the House was up the better. [Opposition cheers.]

MR. T. H. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) did not desire to say much in support of the Bill. But there was one argument which appeared to him to be very strong indeed, and which the right hon. Gentleman had not dealt with. Why, if our own prison-made goods did not compete with our own free labour goods, should we admit the labour of convicts abroad to compete with free labour in this country? Was not the Government justified, nay, compelled to take these steps? Was not the Bill the logical consequence of the steps taken by Mr. Matthews to prevent our own prison-made goods competing with free labour goods? The right hon. Gentleman said there had been no defence of the Bill from the Front Bench. He ventured to say there had been no attack upon the principle of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman himself had made no attack upon the principle of the Bill. He seemed to him to be rather a weak and faint-hearted supporter of the principle of the Bill; but he had not the courage of his opinions like his hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield had. [Laughter.] Well, he did not know why the right hon. Gentleman the ex-President of the Board of Trade expressed such derision; and he hoped that before the Debate concluded they would hear why. That this Bill was of considerable importance to the country was, he thought, admitted by all hon. Members opposite. The hon. Member for Battersea, he thought, had said that party capital had been made of this, and nearly all the hon. Members who had spoken on the other side had spoken in a similar sense. How could party capital be made out of a Bill if the people of the country took no interest in it? He ventured to say this was a subject in which the constituencies, in which the working classes had and did take a very great interest. Even if only a few of their number were affected, they stood together and had a fellow feeling—["hear, hear!"]—and even if only a small and isolated body of brushmakers were injured by the competition he ventured to say that the whole of the working classes had a feeling of sympathy for them. If that was the case he did think that the Front Opposition Bench had shown a spirit of singular indifference to the importance of this Debate. The right hon. Gentleman, one of the Presidents of the Board of Trade in the last Administration, made in 1895 a most valuable contribution to the Debate; and said in the course of his speech that it was only natural and reasonable that the working classes should feel aggrieved when their free labour came into competition with foreign convict labour. Had the right hon. Gentleman nothing to say now? He ventured to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he did not intend to take any part in this Debate. The country would certainly remark, if he did not, upon the absolute indifference shown by the two men on the front Opposition Bench best qualified to form an opinion on the subject, viz., two ex-Presidents of the Board of Trade. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. J. SAMUEL (Stockton) as one of the representatives of a town where brushes were made, accepted the challenge of the hon. Member who had challenged any one representing the working classes to take part in the Debate. He thought that the Gentlemen who pleaded for the Bill should give the House some statistics to show to what extent the importation of foreign prison-made goods affected the trade of this country. If they took the brush trade, no one who had read the evidence contained in the Report presented by the Committee some time ago could avoid coming to the conclusion that so far as the brush trade was concerned, the evidence was not conclusive in favour of the theory that the importation of foreign prison-made brushes affected in any way the trade of this country. It was stated by almost every brushmaker who gave evidence before the Committee that, as far as the best brushes were concerned there was no decline in the manufacture in this country. As to the cheaper brushes, there was the evidence of the representative and part owner of the Star Brush Company, which had the bulk of the business in such brushes, and of Mr. Page, representing a large Norwich firm, that in supporting the agitation against these prison-made goods, the workmen of this country were on the wrong scent. During the four months ending April 30th, 1896, we imported £59,000 worth of brushes, while during the same period we exported £38,000 worth. As to mats and matting, during four months of 1895 we imported £25,000 worth, and exported £16,300 worth. The table presented by the Customs showed that out of £25,000 worth of mats and matting imported, no less than £18,331 worth came from China and Japan. Therefore, in that period only £2,800 worth of mats and matting was imported from Holland and Belgium, and during that same period we exported to Holland and Belgium £2,277 worth. The importation of prison-made goods could not be checked without enormous expense in obtaining evidence. There was astounding evidence before the Merchandise Marks Committee that since the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act the transhipment trade of the country had been deeply affected. This week a representative of the shipowners had stated that the interference with packages by the Customs was prejudicially affecting our shipping trade; and such a result would injure far more workmen than could possibly be concerned in the competition of foreign prison-made brushes. He thought that the House ought to have further evidence that this Bill would effect its object.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.), who was received with Ministerial cheers: I share the surprise of my hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire that we have not heard anything in the course of this Debate from the representative of the Department chiefly concerned in the time of the late Government. I do not forget the very important Debate in 1895, in which the right hon. Gentleman examined the whole question very carefully, and I admit that I am surprised that he has not thought it worth while to give the House the benefit of his opinion, and to tell the House whether, like the whole of his followers, he has completely turned round in the course of the last few years. [Laughter and cheers.] I am well aware that we must not make too great demands on the Front Opposition Bench, and that we have already had a speech from the hon. Gentleman who represents the Opposition on so many occasions. The hon. Member for Dundee always speaks on matters connected with the Navy or with foreign affairs; and now he has undertaken the work of the Board of Trade. [Cheers and laughter.] And it may be said, in the absence of his Leader, that the hon. Member for Dundee is the representative of the Leaders of the Opposition. [Cheers and laughter.] I have personal reason for desiring to magnify the office of the Civil Lord of the Admiralty—[laughter]—and I congratulate my hon. Friend the present Civil Lord of the Admiralty—[renewed laughter]—upon the greatness which is in store for him when the Government of the day is again changed, and when the hon. Member will have to answer for all our affairs. [Laughter.] I have said that this Debate is remarkable as showing a most extraordinary and at present unexplained change of front. For what happened in 1895? In February 1895 a Motion was made calling attention to this grievance, and demanding that the Government should at once—the words "at once" were purposely inserted in the Resolution—[" hear, hear! "]—proceed to deal with the importation of these prison-made goods. The right hon. Gentleman who then represented the Board of Trade did not complain of the Resolution, did not deny that a grievance was established, and did not deny that a remedy was necessary. But he plainly said that, having consulted with his officials, he was unable to find a remedy, and that he would be extremely pleased if the Opposition furnished him with something practical in that way. Then, as soon as he heard that the Opposition could not assist him in that direction, he proposed the appointment of a Committee, which we had reason to believe would take a long time to conduct its investigations, and would lead to no definite or satisfactory end. ["Hear, hear!"] We refused the offer of the Government. It was refused by my hon. Friend the then Mover of the Resolution; it was refused by myself, who was then an independent Member of the House and the Leader of a small section of the House; and it was subsequently refused by my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Balfour), then Leader of the Opposition. That was a direct challenge to the Government. [Cheers.] We refused their offer; we insisted that they should deal with the matter in a practical spirit. What did they do? Did they divide against us? Not a bit of it. [Cheers.] In the first place, they tried to count us out. [Laughter and cheers.] I have said there was a singular inconsistency on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite. They are at least consistent in this, that to-night they tried to count us out again. [Laughter.] Having failed to count us out on the former occasion, they challenged a Division on our Amendment, but when the time came to divide—in the meantime there had been communication between the Front Bench and the Benches below the Gangway—there was no one to call out "No," and accordingly our Resolution was carried nemine contradicente in February, 1895. But afterwards, the then Government, instead of complying with the Resolution, acted in direct disobedience of it by appointing a Departmental Committee, which certainly was not considered satisfactory by those who had supported the Amendment, and which had the effect of delaying the matter until after the general election. ["Hear, hear!"] Up to that period the Government, as I have shown, had admitted, but avoided, their obligations. But now it is entirely different. Here is a Bill to carry out an obligation which has been unanimously supported by the House of Commons, and yet Member after Member gets up on the other side of the House in order to show that the grievance is imaginary, that the evil does not exist, or that if it does exist it ought not to be remedied. [Cheers.] And for this extraordinary change of views and action there is no explanation whatever, except it be the fact that in February, 1895, we were within a month or so of the General Election, and that now, in May, 1897, hon. Members opposite think the General Election is very far off indeed. [Cheers and laughter.] But that is not all. This matter has not been allowed to drop even within the period of office of the present Government. The hon. Gentleman who has now moved the rejection of this Bill got up during the discussion on the Address at the opening of last Session and denounced the Government for not attempting even to fulfil their pledges, and among the pledges to which he gave prominence and importance, as a matter of serious obligation, as a matter to which the greatest attention ought to be paid, but which the Government had neglected, was this very question of prison-made goods. [Laughter and cheers.]

Mr. DALZIEL: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me. I was on that occasion inquiring for information. [Ministerial laughter.] The Government on that occasion were pledged to do something, and it seemed as if they were not going to do anything. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Of course we perfectly understand the hon. Gentleman's desire for information. [Laughter.] When we attempt to carry out the promises we have given, it is declared that the Measures we propose to pass are absolutely unworthy of the support of the House; but if we do not bring forward Measures to fulfil our obligations and pledges, we are told they are matters of the utmost importance, and we are denounced for not bringing them forward. [Laughter and cheers.] We understand these tactics very well, and are fully satisfied. [Renewed cheers and laughter.] But here is a fact which I wish the House to notice, and which I am sure the country will notice. Here is this Measure, and here is a broad issue. In February, 1895, we all appeared to be unanimous in favour of it. That is no longer the case. I want to emphasise that fact. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cannot go down to their constituencies and pretend that they are in favour of the exclusion of prison-made goods. [Cheers.] I do not suppose that even they, for very shame, would dare to run away from the question once more. [Laughter.] They must take a division upon it. [Ministerial and Opposition cheers.] We are grateful to them for having given us the opportunity of separating—what shall I say?—the sheep from the goats. [Laughter.] Now we know what is the value of their support of a Measure in the immediate anticipation of a General Election. [Cheers.] The fear of a General Election being now removed from them, they oppose as bitterly and as strongly as they can the very Measure to which they had previously given their assent so far as its principle is concerned. [Cheers.] At all events, we are satisfied with having the opportunity of redeeming the pledges we have given. [Renewed cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cannot say after this Session that we have disappointed our friends, or that we have been false to our pledges. I undertake to say that at the end of this Session, after two working Sessions, we shall have fulfilled a larger part of our programme than any Government have ever done before. [Loud cheers.] And this, although confessedly it was one of the minor Measures of our programme, is not a matter of that very small importance that the hon. Gentleman opposite seems to think. He will find that it will grow in importance as time goes on. [Laughter.] I feel perfectly certain that as soon as the next General Election is in sight, the hon. Member will begin to think that this is a matter of paramount importance. [Laughter.] The hon. Member for Dundee, referring to a speech I made in the House before the last General Election, said I declared it was a most significant Measure. I said nothing of the kind. In every instance in which I referred to the matter—and I did refer to it in the course of the General Election—I pointed out that in itself it was a small matter, that it was of small economical importance. In this House, however, I pointed out that it was a matter of great political importance. [Cheers.] Yes, and hon. Members have reason to thank me that they took my advice then. ["Hear, hear!"] My advice, given frankly, was that this was a matter to which constituents attached very great importance, and that they would be wise to remember that, and that if they did not remember it we should. What was the result of that frank statement? I did not conceal it; I took advantage of it afterwards. But I gave them the information, and as a result none of them dared to vote against the Resolution. [Cheers.] Now, I say, we are justified, having fairly warned our opponents, in taking advantage of the extremely bad strategy which they have exhibited this afternoon. They have actually given this little Bill a more violent and more strenuous opposition than they have given to any other Measure of the Government, except the Primary Education Bill. Very well, all I hope is that they will stick to this line of policy—["hear, hear!"]—that they will on every platform of the country call attention to their magnificent action tonight—[laughter]—to the opposition which they have offered to this Bill for preventing the importation of prison-made goods, and that they will upon that demand the further confidence of their constituents. [Laughter.] If they do demand that, I hope they may get it. Now, Sir, I have said that I have never exaggerated the economic importance of this matter, but at the same time as a matter of principle it is of very considerable importance, and as a matter of fact it is of enormous importance to a small number of people, and when it is a question of justice, a small number of people have quite as much right to be considered as a large number. Just let us see what is the fact. We are told by hon. Gentlemen opposite that they admit there is a certain amount of public feeling in this matter. The hon. Member for the Spen Valley, I think, said that that was the case, that there was a prejudice among the working classes against having to compete with, and losing their employment in consequence of, the unrestricted importation of goods made by foreign convicts, principally Germans and Belgians. He admitted that, but he called upon us to sacrifice ourselves in the great cause to which he himself is a votary, and show our courage by disregarding public opinion. Well, Sir, that advice comes from a queer quarter. [Laughter.] Why did not hon. Gentlemen opposite pay disregard to public opinion? Why did we not have all these admirable economic arguments at the time of the General Election of 1895? Why did not the hon.

Member for the Kirkcaldy Burghs tell us that free trade was in danger on that occasion? He never opened his lips. All this, therefore, must either be new information, or, as I have suggested, hon. Members opposite think the circumstances have changed and that they have still time to repent. I have said that, although it is not a gigantic evil, neither is it an imaginary evil. What is the fact? The fact is this—that these goods made in foreign prisons and imported into this country compete especially with the brush trade and the mat trade, two minor trades, and that they also compete to a less extent with a considerable number of other trades; and, further, that, if they are not restricted by legislation, we have it on the authority of some German speakers and politicians that it was the intention of the authorities in Germany to spread the industries in the prisons over a larger number of trades, so that we do not know what trade may not ultimately be affected. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundee, who gave the effect of a speech which I believe he had not heard, and refused to quote any language which justified—

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg pardon; I listened to every word of the speech.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: In 1895?

Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Yes; to every word of the speech.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I can only say then that the hon. Gentleman's memory is defective. [Laughter.] But when challenged to produce proof of the statement that I have described this matter to be of extraordinary importance as an economical problem, he quoted as my statement that there was no industry which was safe as long as this state of things was allowed to continue. What was the "state of things?" He did not quote the context, because the speech was only handed to him at the moment, and he had not time to make himself acquainted with it. It was that the then President of the Board of Trade, the right hon. Member for Aberdeen, had explained, as a reason for minimising the evil, that the Germans were benevolently going to extend the process to a great number of other trades.

*Mr. J. BRYCE: No, I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: This is what I said on that occasion, and the right hon. Gentleman being present took no exception to it:—

> "The right hon. Gentleman made an admission. He said that the Germans had spread these prison industries over as many manufactures as possible."

*Mr. J. BRYCE: Certainly.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN:

> "What a satisfactory state of things! How admirable it will read in the newspapers tomorrow! The right hon. Gentleman will be enabled to go to Aberdeen and say to his fellow-citizens there:—'At the present time the Germans in their prisons have not dealt with the jute manufactures;' but a member of the audience will say:—'Oh! but you say that the Germans have spread their prison work over as many industries as possible, and how do you know that the German prison system may not spread even to our industry?'"

[Cheers.] And it was imputed to me, in reference to what I said as to the state of things described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, that I said that, under those circumstances, no industry would be safe! Now, Sir, I say that it is quite true that a very considerable number of industries might really be affected if this principle were unrestricted. But some of the hon. Members opposite have argued that this cannot be a matter worthy of any consideration on our part because prison labour is not cheap. I think it was the hon. Member for Battersea who said that. What an extraordinary ignorance of the state of things that argument shows! In what sense does the hon. Member say that prison labour is not cheap? Of course it is not cheap if a book of profit and loss were kept by every prison, and if a prison conducted its affairs as a private firm does, and opened capital, and interest, and depreciation accounts, and went into the actual cost and everything else. Of course it would not pay to make brushes in prisons in that case. But when practically it does not cost anything because you already have prisons, and do not pay for them, and when everything you get for a brush is profit except the cost of the raw material, then prison labour is by the necessity of the case the cheapest of all labour, and prisons can afford to make goods at what would be a loss to others. We employ prisoners, as the hon. Member for Battersea has said, in making breakwaters, or for work of that kind; but of course it has been found by comparison with ordinary labour to be the most extravagant business possible. At the same time it would be perfectly possible for us to hire out these men at 4d. a day, and the profit would be 4d. a day, although the expense, because of the article manufactured, would be very much more than the cost under ordinary systems of trade. There is no doubt about it, and it is useless for the hon. Member or anyone else to deny it; they do not wish to know where the shoe pinches, but the people engaged in these industries do. They know perfectly well, and it has never been contradicted, that this particular trade has been injured; not merely that the amount of the trade has been diminished, but the profits of the industry altogether destroyed; and it means also that wages are reduced and the workers put in an unfair position. The hon. Member for Battersea says, "Why do not you deal with any other trade?" I defy him to find any other trade in the same position. What is the case here? You have actually by Resolutions in this House prohibited prisoners in this country from working on this productive industry. ["Hear, hear!"] Do let the House bear that in mind when we are dealing with such arguments as those put forward by the hon. Member for the Spen Valley. The hon. Member for Battersea asserts that criminals should be taught an industry and make goods which will be afterwards sold. Why then does he not, to be consistent, propose that prisoners in English gaols should be allowed what they are not now allowed to do—compete with British industry?

Mr. BURNS, interposing, said the right hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken. The Government did not prohibit British prisoners from competing with free labour to the extent he represented. What the Government, to its credit, did was to confine the employment of prison labour to certain areas.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Out of 18,000 prisoners in gaols 300 are employed on work of a kind which comes into competition with free labour. In Germany and Belgium all prisoners are employed on productive work, and this is not allowed to be sold in Germany. It is ear-marked for consumption in this country. [Cheers.] I said "in Germany," I should have said "in these foreign countries." This is what is said by the Belgian newspaper referred to by the hon. Member for Dundee:—

> "The fact that a Bill of this kind was to be introduced into the British Parliament shows that public opinion is much occupied with this Measure, which may have a serious effect on Belgian trade. Owing to the extreme cheapness of these goods"—

see how this article by anticipation contradicts every one of the arguments of hon. Members opposite against this Bill—

> "England has been the principal market for articles manufactured in our prisons, and particularly in our penal settlements. That market once closed to a trade of this particular kind —England no longer condescending to take prison-made goods—they will naturally begin to raise serious and even disloyal competition against the regular trade of Belgium."

[Cheers.] I call the attention of the House to these friends of the working classes. [Cheers.] Here is their proposal—that goods made in Belgian prisons, and which Belgians will not sell in Belgium because it would be disloyal competition with Belgian working men, should come unrestricted into this country to engage in loyal competition with British working men. [Cheers.] The Opposition may be divided on questions of foreign policy, of South African policy, and colonial policy. On this question it is indeed united! [Cheers.] Here is a policy to go to the country with—"Convict labour; convict goods for the British consumer!" [Laughter and cheers.] The hon. Member for Spen Valley said the Bill was a violation of the principles this country had adopted during the last 50 years—"an insidious attack on free trade." He put it forward as a principle of free trade that cheapness to the consumer was the one thing to be regarded. We had nothing to do with where the goods came from, or how they were made.

*Mr. WHITTAKER said this was not quite his point. It was said that prison-made goods, because of their cheapness, displaced labour here, and he submitted that, if that argument was sound, it ought to be applied to all classes of goods, whether made in prisons or anywhere else. [Cheers.]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is quite true. But, unless my memory deceives me, the hon. Member went further. He emphasised it by saying that the great object was that the consumer should buy his goods in the cheapest market. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy adopted the same line of argument. Were the hon. Members consistent? Why, under these circumstances, do they support a resolution against sweated goods. The other side has again and again pressed the view that we are not to buy sweated goods—goods made cheap—because the labour employed in making them is badly paid. Very well; do they mean to say in the same breath that you are not to buy goods cheap when made by ill-priced labour, but you may when they are made cheap by prison labour?

*MR. WHITTAKER said his argument was that the conditions of labour in prisons were not as bad as many other conditions of labour. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] His contention was, if they opposed the importation of goods because made in prisons, why not oppose the importation of goods made under worse conditions?—and he referred to carpets made in Turkey and Asia and to the cheap labour of India. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am afraid I should be abusing the time of the House if I followed the hon. Member into all his arguments. [Opposition cries of "Oh!"] But I am unable to see the consistency of refusing to avail yourself of cheapness, when the result of low wages, and accepting all the conditions of cheapness when the result of foreign convict labour. Yet that is the position to which hon. Members have reduced the theory of free trade. I have said that I hope even now, before the Debate closes, we may hear something from a more prominent Member of the Opposition than the hon. Member for Dundee. If we are favoured to-night with any expression of opinion from either of the two right hon. Gentlemen who spoke in 1895—the Member for Aberdeen and the Member for Montrose—then I am sure they will repeat the language which they then used, and which will convey a most valuable lesson to their followers in regard to the true principles of free trade. [Cheers.] Here is what was said by the Member for South Aberdeen:—"He did not consider that the question of free trade arose in the matter at all." [Ministerial laughter.] Has he changed his mind since 1895 with regard to that point? He cannot say. [Renewed laughter.] I make all allowance for the position in which the right hon. Gentleman finds himself. ["Hear, hear!"] I now come to my right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. J. Morley). He said:—

> "If there is an ardent free-trader in the House it is the humble individual who is addressing you. But can I for one moment think I am bound, in the interest of free trade, or in order to be a consistent free-trader, to admit into the markets of this country convict-made goods made in this country, or convict-made goods made elsewhere?"

[Ministerial laughter and cheers.] Has my right hon. Friend changed his mind? [Mr. J. MORLEY was understood to intimate that he had not.] No; my right hon. Friend is not so coy as his right hon. colleague. [Laughter.] I no longer implore the right hon. Member for Aberdeen to speak. I do not think in the circumstances he could add much to the Debate. ["Hear, hear!"] I am sure I do not mean any disrespect to him, but I mean that, until he has made up his mind about the principles of free trade, I do not see that he can assist us. But my right hon. Friend the Member for Montrose, if he would repeat the lesson he gave in 1895 to his followers below the gangway—if he would teach the hon. Member for the Spen Valley and the hon. Member for the Kirkcaldy District the true principles of free trade—really might do the whole House very considerable service. [Cheers.] I say that under these circumstances it is perfectly absurd for hon. Gentlemen opposite at this time of day to pretend that the principles of free trade are in question. It has nothing to do with the principles of free trade; it has only to do with the principles of common sense and common justice. [Cheers.] I want to point out to the House that every speech to which we have listened, with the possible exception of the speech of the hon. Member for Dundee, has been a speech directly against the principle of this Bill. It is true the hon. Member for Dundee said everything he could think of against the Bill, professed his disbelief in it, and minimised the evil, and undoubtedly, if his arguments were accurate, there ought to be no Bill. But still he did not venture to say, as the other hon. Members opposite did, that he opposed the principle of the Bill. That had hitherto been the main argument, and it is the argument to which I should tie hon. Gentlemen of the Opposition. It is true they added another argument, which is almost one of those works of supererogation. They said the Bill would be ineffective. Of course it is open to them, and if they think they can make it more stringent—if they can make a Bill which is wrong in principle, mind you, which is dealing with a matter which ought not to be dealt with, and does not deserve to be dealt with, more effectively, we shall welcome their assistance. [Cheers.] But in the meantime we, who gave this promise and believed there was a real injustice which ought to be remedied, are satisfied with this Bill, and we believe it will be a remedy. [Cheers.] We have produced our prescription, after all, with very slight delay. [Ministerial cheers.] The Opposition consider there is no disease. You cannot argue the thing from both points of view. Their point is there is no disease. We have produced our prescription and we believe it will be a remedy. As to the persons who think there is no disease, I should say, on the whole, it would be unwise to ask them for a prescription, because under these circumstances it is probable that their pills would be flour and their draughts would be plain water. [Laughter.] But we, who believe there is a grievance, have honestly endeavoured to find a remedy; we believe we have found a remedy, and if in the course of examination in Committee any defect can be shown, we shall be perfectly ready to improve our Bill and to improve our remedy. [Cheers.]

*MR. JAMES BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) would very frankly satisfy the curiosity of the right hon. Gentleman as to why he did not speak earlier in the Debate. He was very curious to listen to the right hon. Gentleman, and was very anxious to hear how he would reconcile his speech of two years ago with the Bill of to-day. He was very curious to know how he would reconcile the extreme and extravagant language which he used in speaking on this question of foreign prison-made goods in February, 1895, with the minimising and deprecatory language which had been used that night by the President of the Board of Trade. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] He was very anxious to hear the right hon. Gentleman's statement of the prescription, and to hear him explain and defend a Bill which, on the face of it, seemed an absurd and preposterous remedy. He had been disappointed. [Ministerial cheers.] He had been entertained and amused, and he had listened to an admirable exhibition of political agility. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"] But he had had no light cast upon the question with which the House was asked to deal. It was all very well to make a jest and sport of the matter as the right hon. Gentleman had tried to do. [Opposition cheers.] They had been amusing themselves for the last five hours. They had not been dealing with a serious matter in a serious way at all, but had been merely amusing themselves by putting up a sham Bill on whose behalf not a single word of argument had been offered on the Government Bench. The right hon. Gentleman opposite endeavoured to escape from the language which he used in February, 1895. He would compare the right hon. Gentleman's language then with that which he had used on the present occasion. He had just told them that there was a very small number of people who were affected by it; but what did he say in 1895? He said:—

> "There is no question upon which the working classes of this country have more generally made up their minds than upon this."

[Ministerial cheers, and MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: "I say it now!"] The right hon. Gentleman said it, but it was a different thing to prove it, and he had not attempted to prove it. At the General Election this question was treated with complete contempt. [Ministerial cries of "No!"]

*SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Fifty per cent. of the Unionist Members put it in their programmes. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. BRYCE said that, anyhow, the question had failed utterly to excite the interest of the people of this country. [Ministerial cries of "Prove it!"] He could prove it from his own experience, and he had consulted a great many of his friends, who all said that the question made no difference to them at the election. [Ministerial cries of "Where are they?" and Opposition cries of "Order!"] If hon. Members would refer to the Report of the Departmental Committee they would find that that Committee endeavoured to obtain trade opinion upon this subject. They appealed to the trade union councils, and advertised in a great many newspapers, but they had scarcely any response to their appeals, and they were satisfied that the working classes of this country did not take any interest in the question. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] The right hon. Gentleman opposite said, on the occasion to which he had referred:—

> "We are face to face with what is practically a national and almost unanimous demand."

Where was the evidence of such a demand, and if there was such a demand, why had the Government waited for two years before responding to it? The right hon. Gentleman said that this was a question of great practical importance. They knew what that meant. Practical importance meant in his eyes electioneering importance, and nothing else—["hear, hear!"]—and even in regard to the electioneering importance of the question the right hon. Gentleman was utterly mistaken. [Laughter.] He adhered himself to every word which he used in the Debate in February, 1895. He said then that this was an infinitesimal grievance not worth notice, much less legislation, and that it was useless to legislate for this grievance, such as it was, unless they could legislate effectively. The Bill before the House would not effect a remedy; it would be futile. Let him recall to hon. Members' minds the Report of the Departmental Committee. It was a perfectly impartial Committee. [Ministerial cries of "Oh!"] Its impartiality was not challenged at the time of its appointment.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I took every opportunity of saying it was packed. [Cheers and laughter.]

MR. BRYCE: At that time no one ventured to say that it was not a fair and competent Committee.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I beg pardon. I said so always. [Laughter.]

*MR. BRYCE: The right hon. Gentleman never said so in this House.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I never had the opportunity. It was a hole-and-corner Committee packed in the right hon. Gentleman's own office. [Loud laughter.]

*MR. BRYCE said that the right hon. Gentleman generally found an opportunity of saying a thing which he wanted to say. [Laughter.] He repeated that, although the subject was frequently mentioned in the House, the impartiality of the Committee was not challenged. The hon. Member for Sheffield was himself upon it. [Sir HOWARD VINCENT: "Yes, but I left it!"] [Laughter.] The Report of the Committee went to show that the quantity and value of all prison-made goods imported into this country were extremely small, that it was too small to have any substantial influence on the trade. ["Hear, hear!"] It was an interesting fact that the number of persons employed in the brush and mat making trades had increased during the few years in which the competition of prison-made goods was stated to be injuring the trade; and another interesting fact was that it appeared that in those countries which sent brushes and mats to this country goods were produced by free labour quite as cheaply as by prison labour, so that, as far as the interests of the British workman were concerned, nothing whatever would be gained by prohibiting the importation of prison-made goods. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman made an extraordinary error in his statement about the Germans, when he said they ear-marked these goods for British consumption. That was not the case. ["Hear, hear!"] What the Germans did was not to sell them in the immediate vicinity of the prison—[Ministerial cheers]—that was to say, within eight miles of the prison—but they sold them in other parts of Germany. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to twist some words of his in the former Debate into a meaning they did not bear. The right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to represent that he said that the German Government were increasing the production in a variety of industries in order to compete with British goods. What he did say was:—

> "The policy of the German Government had been to spread prison labour over as many trades as possible"—

["Hear, hear!" from Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]—

> "in order that it might have no injurious effect on any particular trade."

[Cheers and Ministerial laughter.] That was to say, in order that it might not be said that in Germany they were competing with any particular trade, they spread their prison production over a variety of trades—["hear, hear!"]—and it was shown before the Committee that no practical harm could come to British trade from that, or, of course, to German trade. There was not a tittle of evidence to show that any harm was done, and the right hon. Gentleman had never tried to produce any.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I? I did not offer myself as a witness before your Departmental Committee. [Ministerial cheers and laughter.]

MR. BRYCE: The right hon. Gentleman did what was much more important. He offered himself as a witness before the House—[cheers]—and he made statements before the House which were utterly baseless, which he had never even attempted to substantiate, and which he now defied him to substantiate. [Cheers.] Another interesting point was brought out by the Committee—namely, that British machine-made goods, even in the lower kind of brushes, could be produced just as cheaply as foreign-made, and the reason why foreign-made goods were allowed to come in, particularly prison-made goods, was because the British manufacturers found it better worth their while to bestow their attention on the production of the superior. This Committee gave every possible opportunity to the brush and matmakers to state their case, and these were the conclusions they came to, and no one had ever disputed them. [Cheers.]

*SIR HOWARD VINCENT: That was a majority Report. There was a minority Report.

MR. BRYCE said that was the Report of the Committee. The hon. Member left the Committee because he did not like the way the evidence was going. [Cheers.] However, the Committee went further. They inquired not only whether there was a substantial grievance, but also whether, if there was a grievance, it could be remedied. The Committee called some of the officers of the Customs before them and cross-examined them at some length, and they came to the conclusion that the suggestions put forward were unworkable, that they could not be made effective, and that in whatever form they were tried they failed. ["Hear, hear!"] He did not want to detain the House on minor points; they would be found set forth in the evidence and summarised in the Report of the Committee. He was accurate in stating that the suggestions put forward by the Customs were held to be impracticable. He read the words of the Report on this point which declared that the suggestions would do more harm than good, and went on to urge that they were entitled to have some substantial case made out. When they pressed for some kind of figures the Colonial Secretary was obliged to fall back on some anonymous article in a Belgian paper. [Opposition laughter.] He could only say they must have some other evidence than that of an anonymous writer, who might be the Member for Sheffield himself. [Loud laughter.] It was little short of an insult to the House of Commons—["hear, hear!"]—to ask them to pass legislation on the authority of some writer in a Belgian paper. [Cheers.] They asked the promoters to tender evidence,but they could not get it. How were they to get evidence that a brush was made in a prison or not? A brush did not tell its own tale as to where it was made. It was not stamped that it was made in a German prison. The idea was absurd. The Colonial Secretary seemed to have an idea that some persons would be watching round the doors of German prisons, and that they would follow the brushes from one wholesale warehouse to another until at last it came here. [Laughter] They knew that in the case of the Merchandise Marks Acts traders would not come forward to help the Board of Trade to enforce those Acts. The Board of Trade must do it themselves; yet the Merchandise Marks Act was much easier of application than this Bill would prove to be. There was not the slightest reason to believe that the evidence would be attainable. They had some experience of other countries. In America, and, he dared say, in Canada, there were a good many laws which looked well on paper, but not in fact. The authorities had received power to make regulations, but none were made, and it was impossible to make out what the authorities were doing. It was easy when there was some trivial demand, or when some one was playing an electioneering card, to bring forward a Bill like this; but the business of responsible and worthy statesmanship was not to bring in Bills unless they could make them work. [Cheers.] The "prescription" of the right hon. Gentleman had been referred to. He remembered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman well; it was a curious speech, and it was remarked at the time as being noteworthy for an unaccountable bitterness of tone and language. It culminated in the expression, "We are not going to lend them our prescriptions while he takes the fees." It was observed at the time that it was not, at any rate, a very patriotic course if he had the prescription and was not going to give the country the benefit of it. But now we know that he had no prescription at all. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman went a little further. He did a thing on that occasion which he never remembered a responsible Minister doing before. He turned upon and accused the officials of the Department over which he once had presided. [Cheers.] A less becoming act on the part of a responsible Minister had never been done before. [Cheers.] Now the House knew what the "prescription" was. It was a bread pill. [Laughter.] Any one could prescribe a bread pill; the late Government could have prescribed it then; in fact, there was a Bill of the hon. Member for Sheffield before the House which was like this Bill, only a little better. [Laughter.] That Bill might, at any rate, have been tried; this Bill was not worth trying; and he thought that the bread pill of the right hon. Gentleman would be received in every quarter with that unconcern and indifference it deserved. [Cheers.] The Bill was a sham and an imposture from beginning to end. [Cheers and "Divide!"] He went further and said that the Bill and the whole of the agitation on this subject had been a piece of demagogy—[cheers]—which was not creditable to those who had practised it. [Cheers.] He did not think that the Bill could do any harm—[ironical laughter]—but he thought it was not creditable to the House to pass Bills which would do no good, and which would be an unworkable remedy for an insignificant grievance. [Cheers.]

MR. SAMUEL HOARE (Norwich), as the representative of a constituency which did not look on this Bill as a trifling Measure, protested against the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. He also protested against the argument used by the right hon. Gentleman that when this question was brought before the electors at the last election it was treated with contempt. The contrary was the fact. It was also said that because it was a small matter the House ought not to take up the question. Hon. Gentlemen might as well say that because a man had his pocket picked of 6d., the thief ought not to be punished, because he had not taken more money. In his constituency they considered that this prison labour had robbed the working people of their labour and wages, and he hoped that the House would pass the Bill by a large majority. He mentioned the case of a manufacturer who found that the competition of prisons and reformatory colonies in Belgium was so strong that he had been compelled to go to Belgium and attempt to contract for the labour himself in order that he might be able to compete. The evidence of another brush manufacturer was that he could not possibly compete with prison-made goods, and he knew of three firms, employing 120 hands, who had had to give up their businesses owing to the competition of such goods. We did not allow our own prisoners to compete, except to a very trifling extent, with free labour. Surely, therefore, we ought not to allow the authorities of foreign prisons to send their goods here, goods which were not sold in their own countries. It might be that this Bill would not prove a remedy for the grievance, but, at any rate, it would express the opinion of the House of Commons that some remedy for the evil should be devised, and experience would enable them to amend it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeenshire had said he was filled with disappointment by the statement of the Colonial Secretary. In 1895 the right hon. Gentleman said he did not believe it was possible to introduce a Bill—[Mr. BRYCE: "An effectual Bill!"]—and therefore, no doubt, he was filled with disappointment because this Government had introduced a Bill, one which would be very acceptable to the country. It might be true that only a very small number of people were affected by the Measure, but the country would realise that though the numbers concerned were small, the Government were desirous of seeing justice done to the working classes. In face of the fact that hon. Gentlemen opposite had supported a Motion which declared that it was necessary to take at once some step to remedy this evil, he could not understand why they now thought the remedy could be put off. By going into the "No" lobby upon this occasion they would express their opinion that it was impossible to remedy the evil by legislation, and that therefore they would not make any attempt at a remedy. The supporters of the Bill would vote for it with the conscientious feeling that they were trying to find a remedy for the evil, that they were trying to prevent honest labour being interfered with by the work of prisoners in foreign prisons.

MR. W. ALLAN (Gateshead) saw in the Bill a portion of that policy which they heard of a few nights ago for the taxation of corn. It was said it was meant for the benefit of the working classes, but it did not go far enough to do that. It was honestly meant for that purpose; why did not they go further? What did they do for the working classes who were out of employment by window-sashes and frames being brought into this country, or by flooring, planed, beaded and grooved, being brought in; or what did they do for the glass trade? Had they ever shown any desire whatever to look after these trades? [Ministerial cries of "Yes!"] None whatever; and, forsooth! the House was asked to deal with brushes and mats. Had they come to this, that they had to spend hour after hour in discussing shaving brushes and door mats? The whole amount involved per annum was an absolute trifle, and, above all that, they were the cheapest rubbish that came into the country, and that was the reason so few of them were sold. The Bill was simply an absurdity. It was of no use at all, and would not benefit the working classes one iota. The House of Commons was wasting its precious time by such legislation. They wanted something more in keeping with the traditional greatness of the House than trifles of that kind. Did hon. Gentlemen opposite want Protection? [Some Ministerial cries of "Yes!"] Now they knew where they were, and he would tell those hon. Gentlemen that he would fight them to the death on that question. Speaking as a working man, and as one who knew the working men as well, perhaps, as anyone in that House, he said honestly and fearlessly that this Bill was a sham.

MR. J. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston) maintained that the Secretary of State for the Colonies had shown his characteristic prescience when he said that no industry was safe while the present state of things existed. He had canvassed every house and workshop in his constituency, and there were in it numbers of brush factories and mat factories, and boot factories too, which today were suffering from the unfair competition of penal labour in foreign countries. In the London County Council he had had something to do, in conjunction with the hon. Member for Battersea, in drafting a clause, which appeared in all their tenders, to provide that fair wages should be paid to all the employés of those who competed for contracts, but such a clause was largely neutralised while they allowed contractors to supply asylums and other public institutions with goods imported from abroad, some of them the very goods of which they now complained. As a close student of the matter he asserted that, while this might be a small question in the main, yet in a constituency like his own it was a very large question.

Sir J. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) appealed to the Government not to continue the system of legislation by reference, but to make their Bills self-intelligible.

The House divided:—Ayes, 221: Noes, 90.—(Division List, No. 208—appended.)

The announcement of the numbers was received with cheers and counter cheers.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL.

Read a Second time.

The Marquess of LONDONDERRY moved:—

> "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Bill shall be referred (1) to omit Part IV. and Schedules; (2) to inquire into the advisability of extending the municipal franchise to all Parliamentary voters, and of providing that the burgess lists shall be revised and made up by the same persons and at the same time as the Parliamentary register, before the increased powers proposed to be given by the Bill are conferred upon the Corporation, and to make provisions in the Bill for same; and that they have power to make provisions for an amendment of the law as to the election and tenure of office of aldermen councillors, and as to the appointment and tenure of office of any officers annually elected by the Corporation, or appointed by any persons nominated by the Corporation."

He said that on no less than three occasions had a Bill of a similar character been presented to Parliament, and the Bill might appear at first sight innocuous and harmless. The first three provisions were as follows: (1) to borrow money for fire brigade purposes; (2) to enable the Corporation to compel the owner or occupier of vacant land likely to be a nuisance to fence it in; and (3) to make further provision with regard to the supply of water. Those three provisions had the hearty support of the section of the community whom he represented. But the Bill went a great deal further than that, because it interfered with the municipal franchise as it at present existed. Now, he submitted that the question of the franchise could only be dealt with by Parliament, and not by private individuals bringing in a Bill to promote the interests of a certain section of the community, and interfering with the right of franchise at present enjoyed by other sections. In support of that doctrine he quoted declarations made by the Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Morley, as well as the Speaker of the House of Commons. At present the rating qualification in Dublin was represented by the very smallest coin of the realm. It was divided into two sections, the ratepayers who paid £8 and over, and those who paid less. The ratepayers of £8 and over were automatically placed in the list or roll of burgesses, subject to their having paid their rates and fulfilled the residence qualification. In the case of those who paid less than £8, they had to prove the same conditions, but what he particularly drew attention to was that these rates were invariably paid by the landlord. Of course it might be said that these rates were taken into consideration in the rent, but the answer to that was that the rent taken would in no way be altered whether the rates were paid by the landlord or by the tenant. Consequently the tenant got considerably the better part of the bargain. But what was the result? The result was that those ratepayers who paid no rates whatever formed the great majority of Dublin burgesses. What would be the situation if his Instruction were not accepted? In the first place, the Town Clerk would be forced to place on the roll every occupier, no matter what might be his period of residence. The real ratepayer who paid rates as tenant would be placed on a far worse footing, and at a great disadvantage as compared with the occupying tenant who paid no rates whatever. The Town Clerk would be forced to place upon the roll men who, he knew well, should be disqualified from having a vote at all, for the simple reason that they had not been in occupation sufficiently long to qualify them for a vote.

The onus of disproving the right rested upon those who objected, and what would be the result? He was told on good authority that in July of next year 50 per cent. of the new voters would have changed their residence and lost their qualification, with the result that 15,000 additional voters, mostly bogus, would be added to the list of those who enjoyed the municipal franchise. Of course, it might be said that these voters could be objected to, but under the municipal franchise this involved personal service of the objection, and to prove that 15,000 objections had been served on 15,000 people by hand was not only a very tiresome but a very costly business. There was another point. Under this Bill, the Town Clerk received remuneration for preparing the list of those whom he proposed to add to the municipal franchise, and while he had every confidence in the present Town Clerk, he was not so confident that the Town Clerks who might be appointed in years to come would discharge their duties with the same impartiality. The Unionist Party in Dublin maintained that if the municipal franchise were to be altered and ameliorated it should be done by Parliament, and not by a Bill which was ostensibly to deal with the water supply of Dublin, but in reality meant to eliminate the Unionist majority in Dublin from the representation they at present enjoyed. At the present moment they could boast only of 11 members out of 60. But if these 15,000 further voters were enfranchised, the Unionists would be absolutely eliminated. Perhaps it would be said to him, connected as he was with the North of Ireland, that this was the procedure which had been followed in Belfast and other cities where the Protestant element was paramount. He contradicted that argument. A franchise Bill had been recently passed which had given to the very small Nationalist minority in Belfast considerable representation on the Corporation. The same thing had taken place in Armagh and Derry; and, therefore, if the Nationalist Party, which was in a minority in these cities, were allowed that representation which he maintained a minority should always be allowed to have, the Unionist minority in Dublin had an equal claim to representation. It might be said, Why did not the Unionist Party in the House of Commons reject the Measure? The Unionists in Dublin had fully believed that the majority which they had helped to return to Parliament would see that their rights were not taken away; and that this Water Bill, with political clauses tacked on at the fag end, would have been denounced by the Chief Secretary. On the 30th March a whip was issued by the Unionist Whips in the House of Commons, stating that the Dublin Corporation Bill would be taken at the time of Private Business, and that an Amendment would be moved by Mr. Carson. The Dublin Unionists imagined from that that the Government were going to protect their rights. He did not wish to say a word derogatory of the Chief Secretary, but his right hon. Friend could not have understood the importance of the question when he said that he did not regard it as a Party question, and that everyone was to vote as he liked. In consequence of that declaration, and the fact that the Dublin Unionists did not issue a whip—which they would have done, had they known what line the Chief Secretary was going to take—the franchise clauses were carried by a very small majority. The feelings of the Dublin Unionists were very strong. A meeting was held by them on Monday last, presided over by the President of the Chamber of Commerce, and attended by one of the Governors of the Bank of Ireland, and by the most influential Unionists of the city; and that meeting had requested him to move these Instructions in the House of Lords, declaring that as they helped to return a majority of 150 in favour of Unionist principles they could not understand why that majority should consent to the elimination of Unionists in Dublin. He knew that certain noble Lords and intimate friends of his in the House of Commons would like to see the franchise extended to women, and objected to the line taken by Mr. Carson, because it excluded women. He would tell their Lordships in strict confidence that he was a very anti-woman voter—[laughter]—but he was not so narrow-minded as not to recognise the strength of the convictions of his friends who thought differently from him on that point. But why did they not get a Bill brought in to deal with the question, instead of supporting a Measure which was ostensibly a Water Bill? It was the duty of Parliament to deal with the question frankly, and not to allow it to be settled in a Private Bill. He maintained that the action of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees was not, according to his own showing, advisable, and, according to the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Lords, that it was very near the line where it would be out of order. He should be perfectly willing to support the Bill without the franchise clauses; but so unjust did he think the treatment of the loyal minority in Dublin, that unless those clauses were withdrawn, he should ask their Lordships to support his Instruction.

THE EARL OF MORLEY (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said that his action in introducing this Bill was merely a part of his official duties as Chairman of Committees. He was in no way responsible for all the Private Bills which he from time to time introduced. His practice was, if a Bill were opposed on Second Reading, not to move the Second Reading; but as he presumed that this Bill was not opposed in principle, but that only part of it was opposed, he thought it his duty to introduce the Measure to their Lordships' notice. He was in no way responsible for what it had contained. He need not enter into the long question of the franchise, but he would state the history of the Bill, and the position of the question generally. As to the Instruction of his noble Friend, it had not of recent years been the practice in their Lordships' House to move mandatory Instructions to the Committees to which Private Bills were referred; and though his noble Friend was within his rights, he rather deprecated such a practice gaining ground. The second part of the Instruction seemed to go far beyond the scope of the Bill itself, and direct the Committee to introduce into the Bill matters which would not be covered by the notices issued with the Bill in November last; and on that ground, the Measure, if amended, as his noble Friend desired, would not be in accordance with the Standing Orders. As to the Bill itself, his noble Friend said quite justly that it was a Water Bill, and he adhered most strongly to the opinion which he expressed last year, that these franchise clauses should not be introduced into Private Bills. But at the same time, it was necessary to consider the circumstances and reasons which had led to their being introduced in this case. Last year the Bill was introduced in the House of Lords purely as a Water Bill. During its passage through the House of Commons the franchise clauses were introduced under a mandatory Resolution passed by the whole House. When the Bill came back to the House of Lords, their Lordships had no opportunity of discussing the new question raised, and there was no time for any opponent to the clauses to be heard. As the new clauses were not covered by the notices issued with the Bill in the previous November, they were so obviously out of order, that the Standing Orders Committee refused to dispense with the Standing Orders in respect of that portion of the Bill, and the Bill was returned to the House of Commons with those clauses struck out. The consequence was that the Bill was lost, and the Dublin Corporation spent its money in vain. This year the Water Bill was reintroduced, but with a view of avoiding the catastrophe of last year, the Corporation put the franchise clauses into the original draft, and they were covered by the notices issued with the Bill in the previous November. The Bill was introduced first in the House of Commons, where an Instruction was carried by the whole House empowering the Committee to introduce another franchise clause giving the vote to women. The Bill came back to the House on Report with this additional clause inserted, and then a Motion was made for the omission of the franchise clauses altogether. That Motion was rejected; and, therefore, the Bill came to their Lordships' House with the old franchise clauses and the new one expressly approved by the House of Commons. Though he entirely adhered to the opinion he had expressed on more than one occasion that it was undesirable to insert measures of this kind having a party and political character attached to them into private Bills, he asked the House to consider whether it was desirable, after what had passed in the House of Commons, to send back the Bill with the clauses omitted from it, with the almost certain result that the Bill would be again wrecked, that the money spent in promoting it would be lost, and the long-standing quarrel about water between Dublin and the surrounding districts would be left unsettled. Their Lordships might say that the franchise was of more importance than water. ["Hear, hear!"] He would not argue that question, but he would point out to the House that if the principle was for the first time embodied in the Bill, he would agree that the clauses should be expunged. But a Bill attempting to prove the present admittedly unsatisfactory condition of the Irish municipal franchise having unfortunately failed to pass into law, owing to the change of Government a few years ago, the result was that individual Irish boroughs had taken advantage of gas or water Bills to introduce modifications into their system of municipal franchise. That was done in the case of Belfast, Londonderry, Armagh, Drogheda, Waterford, and in the districts around Dublin, Blackrock, Rathmines, and Kingstown. Therefore, having those precedents in view, it was doubtful whether it could now be argued fairly that the municipal franchise must not be altered in private Bills. He did not wish to argue with his noble Friend as to the effect of the clauses. They were rather difficult to grasp, but, as he understood them, they did not alter the actual qualifications of the municipal electors, but created a new mode for their getting on the burgess roll. No doubt that alteration in procedure would have a large effect, but the franchise was not altered, and, having regard to the fact that the Measure had been passed by the House of Commons, that it did not establish a precedent, because, unfortunately, the precedent had been established in many cases before, and having regard also to the fact that, if the Instruction were passed, it would mean the almost certain destruction of the Bill, he thought the House would have some hesitation before accepting the Instruction.

The Earl of MAYO said he did not give way to the noble Marquess in regard to his principles as a Unionist, and he knew very well who were the people who had whipped up the Irish Unionist Peers in this matter. But, after all, considering the relative numbers of Nationalists and Unionists in Dublin, the question of Unionist representation in the Corporation of Dublin was not of great importance. He would point out that the ratepayers of Dublin had already paid £10,000 in the promotion of Bills of a similar character to this, but which had failed to pass, and if the Instruction of the noble Marquess were carried, this Bill would also be wrecked. It was all very well to say the Unionists should have a representation on the Corporation of Dublin, but they must take matters as they found them in Dublin, and so long as matters remained as they were at present, the Nationalists would continue to run the show in Dublin. He thought the Irish Unionist Alliance, of which he was a member, was a little hysterical about this question. In another whip that had been sent out by another Unionist Party in Dublin—the Unionist Burgesses—it was said that the Bill, if passed, would seriously discourage Unionist activity in Dublin, and that it would imperil the safety of the Unionist representation of the Stephen's Green Division in Parliament. With all due respect to those people, he should say that that was rubbish. He hoped the House would follow the advice given by Lord Morley, and allow the Bill to go through. Things were carried on in Ireland in a different way than they were carried on in this country. There were not in Ireland such sticklers for order as they were in England. But the Bill, as it stood, would not do that immense amount of harm to the Unionist cause in Dublin that the noble Marquess seemed to apprehend, and, on the other hand, he, who worked a great deal with the people of Dublin in many matters, was aware that it was a good Measure.

*The Earl of BELMORE said he was not converted by the arguments of his noble Friend, which were curious arguments coming from a Unionist source. This Bill was primarily a water Bill. He had no wish to stand in the way of a good water supply to Dublin, where, although he was not a rated occupier, he spent a good deal of time during the year, and used a good deal of Dublin water. But he considered that the franchise clauses were more important than the water clauses. His reasons for supporting the Instruction of the noble Marquess were that the proposed alteration in municipal franchise procedure would have the effect of creating a large number of faggot votes. He did not agree with the noble Marquess that the 15,000 votes that would be added to the franchise would be all faggot votes, but it was clear that a large proportion of them would be of that character. The result would be that the Unionist representation of Dublin would probably be reduced to nothing, and the largest ratepayers would have no voice in the spending of the rates. He had always held that taxation and representation should go together. That was considered a sound doctrine when he was young, but it was not fashionable now. He, however, still supported it, and for that reason he intended to vote for the Instruction of the noble Marquess.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH said he would not have intervened in the Debate had not the noble Marquess referred to the Government opposition to his Instruction. He therefore merely wished to say that there was no Government opposition to the Instruction, neither was there any Government approval of it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY) said he was not disposed to withdraw from what he had said on a former occasion as to the inconvenience and irregularity of amending the municipal franchise law by means of private Bills intended to supply communities with gas or water. It was calculated to reduce what was a great public question —the question of how the franchise should be exercised by the community— into a mere local question between parties. He could not deny that Parliament had in the past allowed a certain number of boroughs in Ireland to reform their civic electoral system by means of private Bills, and it might be argued that it would not be fair, after allowing it in one case, to disallow it in another. If the Committee to whom the Bill was referred thought there were inappropriate provisions in it, it would be competent for them to strike them out if they liked, but this was a mandatory Instruction to the Committee, which did not give them discretion in the matter. He had read the Bill with great care, and he thought it needed to be so read, and there were some objections which he should entertain very strongly if he were sitting on the Committee. It would be open to the noble Marquess to move an Amendment to the Bill even after the Committee stage. He confessed it seemed to him to be a somewhat precipitate course to take from the Committee any discretion. He suggested to the noble Marquess that he should divide the Instruction into two parts, and deal with the second part afterwards.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY entirely concurred with the noble and learned Lord as to the objection generally to the practice. He thought it was obviously inconvenient to deal with such a subject as municipal franchise in a Bill of this kind. If the Bill went to a Committee there would be ample opportunity to amend any provisions, and on the Third Reading the House might deal with it as it thought proper. He thought nothing was more objectionable than that municipal matters should be considered with reference to the divisions of political parties in this country. [Cheers.] An alteration in the franchise should not be made with reference to any consideration whatever as to whether the alterations would be in favour, or not, of the Unionist, Nationalist, or any other party in Dublin, but simply on the ground of whether the whole population in a municipality was or was not fairly represented. ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE DUKE OF RUTLAND said he quite agreed with what had been said by the last speaker, and by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack on the subject of introducing politcal considerations into gas and waer Bills; but the argument appeared to him to be an extraordinary one, that because the Houses of Parliament had committed an error once or twice—[cheers]—that error should be perpetuated for all time. That was an unfortunate position to adopt. He was quite willing to incur the slight inconvenience which might result from voting for the noble Marquess's Instruction and disregarding the other precedents.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY said he entirely concurred with that part of the Bill which dealt with the subject of water, but he entirely disapproved of that part which dealt with municipal or political matters. He had desired to divide his Instruction into two parts, and if he had been defeated on the first part he had intended to divide the House on second part. He entirely dissociated from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, he would ask the House to accept the first part of the Instruction, and if that were carried he would drop the second part. He entirely disassociated himself from the political question, which he thought had been introduced for Party purposes.

The House divided on the Motion, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Bill shall be referred to omit Part IV. and Schedules."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Does the noble Marquess move the second part of the Instruction?

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: No.

JURIES DETENTION BILL.

Committee (which stands appointed for Monday next) put off to Thursday next.

MERSEY CHANNELS BILL.

Brought from the Commons; Read 1ª; and to be printed.—[No. 84.]

FISHERIES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.].

A Bill to amend the Fisheries Acts was presented by the Earl of Dudley; Read 1ª; and to be printed.—[No. 88.]

CHURCH PATRONAGE TRANSFERS BILL [H.L.].

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said the Bill was brief in itself and simple in its character. It was intended to meet a difficulty of not infrequent occurrence. It was obviously desirable that the Bishop should be able to know who was the patron of any individual benefices in his diocese; and in some senses it was important and necessary, because there were occasions on which notices had to be given to the patron of the living when any steps were taken in regard to it. In a large number of instances this knowledge was not within the reach of the Bishop. All that could be ascertained was who made the presentation to the living when a vacancy last occurred. Since that date the patronage might have changed hands many times, and frequently that had been the case. When the living became vacant the presentation was sent to the Bishop, who was bound to act upon it on ascertaining that the presentation in itself was valid. But all the time this might be an illegal transaction. The patronage might have been sold during the vacancy. It was to meet such a case that he had drawn up this Bill, and he believed it would meet a large number of cases which were continually occurring and giving trouble to the Bishops. The Bill provided that on a living becoming vacant notice in writing of the intended transfer and the address of transferor and transferee should be sent to the Bishop. This would render impossible the sale of next presentations during the time of a vacancy. Besides meeting a practical difficulty the Bill would tend, if not to abolish, at any rate to diminish, the traffic in livings, because when livings were sold they were often repurchased and sold again, and passed from hand to hand that some pecuniary gain might be made. He moved the Second Reading of the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought the House would be well advised to see if the Bill carried out the object which the most rev. Prelate had in view, as he could see one or two difficulties which might arise by adhering to the language of the Bill without providing some safeguards.

LORD HERSCHELL said he heartily sympathised with the object of the Bill. But his fear was lest it should be too little. It dealt with a great evil—of that he had no doubt—but it dealt with it so tenderly that he was afraid it would not do much to diminish the evil.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said he was quite aware that there was a much larger question lying behind; but attempts had been made to deal with the larger question both in that House and the other without any success. Therefore, it was better to do what one could, even if the Bill did not cover the whole scope of the evil, than let abuses go on year after year without any attempt to deal with them. He would be willing in Committee to make any alteration in the wording of the Measure, but he trusted that by allowing the Second Reading of the Bill their Lordships would show the desire, which he was sure they all felt, to get rid of this abuse, and do what they could, if they could not do all they desired. ["Hear, hear!"]

Read 2^a (according to Order); and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S OFFICERS' SUPERANNUATION BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order); Bills reported without Amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bills to be Read 3^a on Monday next.

REGULAR AND ELDERS' WIDOWS

Considered in Committee (according to Order); reported without Amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be Read 3^a on Monday next.

ARCHDEACONRY OF CORNWALL BILL.

Read 3^a (according to Order), and passed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS (HOLIDAYS) BILL.

LORD BELPER, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, said it was to enable the Metropolitan Police Courts to be closed on any day observed as a bank holiday. The immediate object of the Bill was to enable the courts to be closed on June 22, the day for the celebration of the 60th year of the Queen's reign. The courts were closed on thanksgiving days, but there was a technical reason for not proclaiming June 22 as a Thanksgiving Day, because, under the Bills of Exchange Act, bills due on bank holidays became payable the day after, but bills due on thanksgiving days were payable the day before. The Bill had passed the House of Commons, and it was desirable it should become law without delay.

Read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA (HEALTH).

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN rose to call attention to the prevalence of contagious diseases in Her Majesty's Army, especially in India, and to move,—

> "That in view of the Report of the Departmental Committee of the India Office of February 20. 1897, it is, in the opinion of this House, urgently necessary that an Inquiry be made into the effect of such diseases upon the Forces of the Crown, the civil population, and the native races within Her Majesty's dominions, and into the nature and results of the measures which are, or have been, in force in this and other countries for the prevention of such diseases."

He said that since he put this Motion down on the Notice Paper some time ago, a very considerable change had taken place in the circumstances. Had he brought the matter forward at that time, he would have been bound to enter into a somewhat lengthy and exhaustive examination of a good many facts and statistics. But since then a Departmental Committee, presided over by his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State for India, had presented a Report which dealt with all the facts of the case as far as they affected India, clearly and graphically, and the Secretary of State had issued a Dispatch to the Indian Government on the subject with which their Lordships were cognisant. It would not, therefore, be necessary for him to go in great detail into ancient facts and statistics. The Report relieved him of that, but it also opened up a very much larger aspect of the whole case, for it referred not only to the reaction of the disease upon Her Majesty's troops in India, but also to the reaction and its effects upon the whole population at home. While he most heartily approved and applauded what the Government had done he could not conscientiously say he believed that any Measures which might be taken by the Indian Government subject to the limitations which were laid down in the Dispatch of the Secretary of State would prove efficacious in dealing with this evil, which was so detrimental to the strength of the Army in India and dangerous to the health of the whole community at home. In 1877 the admissions to hospital from venereal diseases were 362 per 1,000. In 1895 they had risen to 537 per 1,000. That was to say that during those eight years this proportion of men on the sick list owing to these causes had increased at the rate of 48 per cent., and more than half the total number of the forces in India had been affected by the diseases. The effect of this condition of things upon the efficiency of the troops in India was most graphically described in the Departmental Committee's Report. It stated that in 1895, 45 per 1,000, or, altogether, 3,200 men out of a total force of 71,031, were constantly in hospital from this cause. These were terribly high figures; but bad as they were they did not, as the Report showed, by any means represent the actual inefficiency. The Report mentioned cases of these diseases which were being treated outside the hospital, and which did not come into the Returns at all. It called attention to the fact that many men were in hospital or under treatment for various diseases of another character, which were either induced or greatly aggravated by venereal disease. The Report also alluded to the fact that a large number of men who were nominally cured were only fit for service under peace conditions, and would break down on field service. Among 5,822 men detailed for field service with the Chitral Relief Force, 462, or nearly 8 per cent., had to be rejected for venereal disease; 279 more, or an additional 4½ per cent., had to be transferred from the field hospitals to the base for the same cause. The Chitral force was a fair sample of the whole, and calculating on that basis they were face to face with the appalling fact that out of a force of 70,000 men no less than 9,000, or 13 per cent. of the whole, were unfit for native service, owing to a cause which, to a great extent, at any rate, was a preventible cause. ["Hear, hear!"] The Report certainly did not make the worst of the case. In cases of that kind it merely assumed that a soldier sent to the field hospital and from there to the base on active service was a soldier lost. As a matter of fact the detriment was greater than that, for every sick soldier on a campaign was an encumbrance and infinitely worse than no soldier at all. He remembered very well the speech of his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War, in introducing the Army Reserve Bill, in which he lamented the difficulty of sending so small a force of 20,000 men out of the country without dislocating and disarranging all ordinary military routine, and as their Lordships knew he recommended, and the Legislature sanctioned, an increase in the Army at an annual expense of £600,000. Putting aside altogether their duty as a civilised country, putting aside what he thought their duty as a humane nation and acting within the spirit of the religion they professed, putting aside also the protective duty that Parliament owed to the whole community and looking at the matter purely from a commercial point of view as a mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence, it was perfectly plain that if efficacious steps could be taken to check the ravages of this disease there would be a greater gain to the efficiency of the Army than there would be by the increase to the Army that the Legislature had recently sanctioned, and his noble Friend would no longer have to deplore, or, at any rate, not to the same extent, the lamentable fact that they could not send 20,000 men out of the country without disarranging the whole course of their military routine. That was bad enough, but this dead loss to the Army did not represent the whole of the mischief, for the knowledge of the prevalence of these diseases had a most detrimental effect on recruiting, parents dissuading their sons from entering the Army from a natural dread of the consequences to which their children might be exposed by service in India. That was not strange, but was a natural state of things. The Report gave an account of the condition of these unfortunate men in Netley:—

> "Before reaching the age of 25 years these young men have come home, presenting a most shocking appearance; some lay there having obviously but a short time to live; others were unrecognisable from disfigurement by reason of the destruction of their features, or had lost their palates, their eyesight, or their sense of hearing; others again were in a state of extreme emaciation, their joints distorted and diseased. Not a few are time-expired, but cannot be discharged in their present condition, incapacitated as they are to earn their livelihood, and in a condition so repulsive that they could not mix with their fellow-men."

Not only had the diseases increased enormously in quantity, but they had also increased enormously in virulence. In 1887 there were 29 per 1,000 suffering from secondary syphilis. That number had been steadily rising until it now amounted to 85 per 1,000. The Return for 1894 showed that of a total of 70,000 men in India 5,421 had been in hospital for secondary diseases during the term of their Indian service, and probably many more were suffering from the same disease who had not been treated in hospital for it. The officials at Netley declared that never had there been so many cases of secondary syphilis in the hospital nor of so bad a type. Consider the effect that that must have upon the civil population at home. Out of 13,000 men who returned from India every year, 3,640 were impregnated with this terrible and fatal disease, and a very small proportion were married. They became absorbed in the population at home; they married, and in many cases they transmitted the disease to their innocent offspring. Moreover, this disease, amongst many terrors and horrors, was transmissible by many means and with the greatest facility. The Departmental report said:—

> "Doctors contract it in the performance of their duties. It may be caught through drinking out of a cup, or smoking a pipe, which has been touched by diseased lips; nurses can communicate it to infants, and infants to nurses. It is altogether a most easily communicable poison. The present condition of the Army in India, with the enormous prevalence of venereal disease which has been shown to exist, yearly sending home thousands of men infected with constitutional taint, is therefore a great and growing source of danger to the whole community. The influence which it is liable to exercise upon the health of the home population is one of the gravest aspects of the whole question."

These grave words were worthy of the attention not only of Parliament, but of the whole country. The gravity of the disease had always been known. In 1882 a Select Committee of the House of Commons reported:—

> "The testimony to its severity, and to the injuries inflicted by it on the person who contracts it by contact, and on his or her innocent descendants, was irrestible."

He remembered that Sir James Paget stated in his evidence before the Lords Committee:—

> "We now know that certain diseases of the lungs, liver, and spleen are all of syphilitic origin, and the mortality from syphilis in its later forms is, every year, found to be larger and larger by its being found to be the source of a number of diseases, which previously were referred to other origins or to accidents."

Quite recently the Royal College of Surgeons described the disease as one

> "which not only undermines the constitution of those who contract it in the first instance, but, by reason of the many ways in which it may be transmitted, destroys the health and happiness of countless other persons, and induces in the children of those originally infected diseases of a most formidable character."

The Royal College of Physicians said that in its opinion the disease was:—

> "One of the most serious, insidious and lasting of all the contagious diseases that afflict humanity."

That was the situation as far as India was concerned. Out of 70,000 men in the Army there, 3,200 were invalided, and 9,000 were absolutely unfit for active service. A constant stream of men was being poured into the population and absorbed by it, conveying the most persistent and virulent poison known into the blood of the people. As to the Army generally, he maintained that the figures were not creditable to us. In round numbers, the figures per 1,000 were—in Germany 27, France 44, Russia 43, Austria 65, Italy 71, and British troops in United Kingdom 204. Various measures had been enforced both at home and in India to deal with the evil. He admitted that the preventive and sanitary measures adopted in India had been more or less a partial failure because they had disappointed those who expected better results. But the causes of the partial failure were the change to the short service system, which introduced into India a very large number of very young and inexperienced men; the creation of camps of exercise; and the greater movement of troops throughout the country. When the men were in the cantonments they were influenced by the regulations in force; when they were absent from the cantonments they were not; and it would be found that disease increased whenever large numbers of men were absent from the cantonments, and decreased when they were within the sphere of influence of protective and sanitary measures. Strong presumptive evidence on that point was made conclusive by the enormous increase in disease and the increase in its severity since the Indian Government were obliged, owing to a most lamentable Resolution of the Legislature —[cheers]—to abolish the regulations. That view was borne out by all the authorities most competent to judge. An experiment was made by the Indian Government in 1884. They closed some hospitals to see what the result would be; and in 1885 it was reported that the experimental closure had resulted in—

> "such an enormous and progressive increase in the prevalence of disease that the military authorities considered it absolutely essential to the efficiency of the troops stationed in the cantonments concerned that the lock hospitals should be speedily re-opened and the preventive rules again enforced."

The Army Sanitary Commission reported not many years ago rather adversely to the regulations; but now they said:—

> "We have now proof that the measures heretofore adopted in India, imperfectly administered as they often were, nevertheless exercised a very sensible influence in checking increase in the number of British soldiers admitted into hospital for venereal disease, and in mitigating the severity of the disease itself."

It had often been said in argument that regulations and rules had proved useless, and that the only thing to be relied upon was moral suasion. It was perfectly certain that both in this country and in India regulations and sanitary measures had proved to be most beneficial. Some years ago a Special Committee of the House of Commons in looking into this matter as it affected England, reported very strongly to the effect that the Acts in force in England had a most beneficial effect. Acting on that Report the House of Commons not long after passed a Resolution and the Acts were repealed affecting England. This evil was of the greatest gravity, and he asked their Lordships to consider how it was proposed to meet and grapple with it. There was an Act in force in India dealing with other contagious diseases like typhoid, cholera, and small-pox, the gist of which was that if a medical officer was convinced on credible testimony that a person was diseased he could be ordered to hospital for examination. If he refused the cantonments magistrate could on the request of the medical officer expel him from the cantonments, but owing to the Resolution of the House of Commons this particular disease was not allowed to come under the operation of the sanitary rules that affected other contagious diseases. This disease was made a privileged disease—[cheers]—and allowed to contract itself out of the Act. He was glad to say that the Government had relieved the country of that gross slur on its common sense and humanity. ["Hear, hear!"] At any rate, this disease was placed in the same category as all other contagious diseases. But he did not see how it was possible for a medical officer to obtain credible testimony of disease in this instance. Where could he get any testimony? In other diseases he thought that their presence was more or less evident in the appearance and general health of the sufferer, even in their early stages; but he believed he was correct in saying that in syphilis there was nothing to be seen in the person's outward appearance and general health during the incipient stages of the disease. He did not see how it was possible for the medical officer under the ordinary rules to ascertain the presence of this disease in its early stages, and of all the diseases which afflicted mankind this was the one disease which required specially to be treated in its early stages in order, if possible, to prevent the frightful ulterior consequences that often ensued. It seemed common sense that if any effective precaution was to be taken, examination was necessary, and he did not see how medical officers could be satisfied of the presence of disease if examination was absolutely forbidden. He should be perfectly content if the Indian Government had a free hand in this matter. If the suggestion that was made by the Committee of the Royal College of Physicians was carried out, he should be perfectly content. They made the following suggestion:—

> "That as the civil, military, and medical officers in India are best acquainted with the local conditions now existing, and affecting this prevalence of venereal disease, so they are the best judges of the most efficient means of dealing with it. Your Committee, therefore, suggests that power be given to the Government of India to take such steps for the mitigation of this evil as these officers may advise."

He saw the other day that the Committee of the Council of the British Institute of Public Health, under the chairmanship of Lord Playfair, were preparing to present a congratulatory address to Her Majesty on the great progress made in the matter of public health during the reign. It was true great advances had been made—except in one particular, and was it not a scandalous and iniquitous thing that now, if they wished to congratulate the Sovereign on the progress sanitation had made during her reign, they must either wilfully shut their eyes to the existence of a terrible evil, or they must admit that never during that reign had her forces been so decimated by disease, and never has the country been in such danger from the same cause. [Cheers.] That was due to the action of Parliament—["hear, hear!"]—in deference to, he had no doubt, a genuine but a very mistaken opinion. He could not understand why people who recognised the danger of pouring a poison of this kind into the blood of the nation, could not unite in their efforts to cleanse the blood of the Army, to purge the life of the nation, and to remove so great a scandal from us as a civilised State. [Cheers.] One thing was absolutely proved, and that was that disease was not a deterrent. The moral argument was totally illogical. If it was wrong to mitigate disease because the fact of disease argued immorality, then it must be wrong to cure the disease—["hear, hear"]—and no human being would make so barbarous a proposition as that. He had seen it suggested that the hospital sheet should be taken into consideration as well as the defaulter's sheet in determining a soldier's character. Nothing could be more unjust. The act was not illegal, and it was suggested to punish not the act, but the purely chance results, for the act in itself was legal. That was not only illogical but monstrously unjust. They had experience on this point. Lord Cardwell passed an Order in 1872 which was in force for seven years—an Order which made a stoppage of pay while men were in hospital from this disease. What was the result? It had no effect whatever as a deterrent, but produced the most disastrous results by inducing men to conceal the fact of disease to the last possible stage. He could not see how any man of common sense could rely on moral force and moral force alone. As practical men, they had to deal with men as they were, and not as they ought to be. If the time came when moral force was sufficiently strong to enable men, at the age when the instincts were strongest and the will power weakest, successfully to resist one of the most dominant of human instincts, then there would be no need for sanitation. But while we did everything possible to bring that time about, it surely behoved us meanwhile to do what could legitimately be done to save these men and the whole nation from the effects of acts which might be immoral and improper. ["Hear, hear!"] There were many matters in connection with this subject on which information was needed: whether the general sanitary law in India could be made more effective; the general and local amount and character of the disease in India; the regulations enforced in other countries and the colonies, especially where they had dealings with native races; all these were questions about which information was difficult to obtain. He did not know where he should go to learn what effect we had had upon the native races with which we had come into contact. That subject had never been much noticed, but it ought to be; because, though we might have a perfect right to colonise and extend our possessions, we could not have any moral right to plant alongside the flag the seeds of an insidious and terrible disease. ["Hear, hear!"] Public opinion needed instruction, though, thank God! it had greatly changed on this matter. The great mass of opinion in the country was beginning to realise the gravity of the evil, and the sinfulness of inaction. The Departmental Committee had performed a most admirable work in bringing together in an accessible form the immense amount of information which was before diffused and difficult to obtain; and he thought that an investigation and report of a similar character, but more extensive, would be the best form of inquiry to hold. Nearly all that was wanted could be obtained from the three Departments most concerned—the War Office, the Colonial Office, and the India Office; but the information must be collated, weeded, examined, and brought into accessible shape, so that those who wished to instruct themselves on this great national matter should have facilities for doing so. ["Hear, hear!"] He was rather puzzled to know what to do in respect to the Amendment which was to be moved. Theoretically, he entirely agreed with it; but he did not see how it was practicable. But perhaps if the House agreed to his Motion and refused to accept the Amendment, they might put themselves in a position which would be capable of misconstruction. In some quarters his Motion had been construed as a dilatory Motion; but nothing was further from his intentions. He asked for an inquiry because he thought information was greatly needed to educate public opinion. He entirely applauded Her Majesty's Government for the steps which they had taken; but he feared that they would not prove effectual, and that their comparative failure would be used as an argument against any regulations. He looked upon this as a matter of great national moment. [Cheers.] It was not a question of party. ["Hear, hear!"] He would support any Government which attempted to deal efficaciously with this great evil; and he was certain that the great bulk of common-sense opinion in the country would sustain this or any Government in a resolute attempt to check the ravages of an evil which was so detrimental to Her Majesty's forces and so dangerous to the whole population, and which was a scandal to this country as a great people and a civilised nation. [Cheers.]

Earl of Dunraven.

LORD ROBERTS OF KANDAHAR: The subject brought forward by the noble Earl is one which nobody would willingly discuss in public if he could conscientiously avoid doing so, and I have been most reluctant to take part in this Debate. But, my Lords, I recognise so strongly the necessity for measures being adopted to arrest the progress of a great and growing evil—an evil which is sapping the strength of our Army and paralysing many of our best troops—that I feel I should be wanting in my duty to my country and the service to which I have the honour to belong were I to shrink from speaking plainly or neglect to do whatever lies in my power to make my countrymen understand the culpability of permitting to continue unchecked a horrible disease, so far-reaching in its results that it threatens seriously to injure the health and physique of a large proportion of the population of the United Kingdom. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not propose to take up your Lordships' time by giving detailed statistics of the disastrous effects of this disease upon the British troops in India; the proceedings of the Committee presided over by the Under Secretary of State for India show how appalling these effects are. I wish merely to draw your attention, my Lords, to two facts which completely, I think, prove the fallacy of the assertion that contagious disease in India has not increased since the abolition of the Contagious Diseases Act, and clearly demonstrate the necessity for action being taken without delay to preserve the health and efficiency of British soldiers serving in our Eastern Empire. One of the facts, my Lords, which I would bring to your notice is the extraordinary number of men now being invalided from India suffering from the effects of this loathsome disease as compared with the numbers invalided from the same cause when the Contagious Diseases Act was in force. In the statement which I hold in my hand the comparison is made out for 1879 and 1880—the two years immediately preceding the relaxation of the regulations framed under the Contagious Diseases Act—and for 1894 and 1895—the two latest years for which returns are available. In 1879 and 1880 the number of British soldiers in India (exclusive of those on service in Afghanistan) were respectively 49,537 and 50,136. During those two years only 126, or less than ·13 per cent., were invalided to England on account of this special disease. In 1894 and 1895 the number of British soldiers in India were respectively 70,983 and 68,331, of whom a total of no less than 648, or nearly ·5 per cent., were sent home from this same cause. In other words, the proportion of men invalided during the latter period on account of this disease was more than four times as great as it was when the Contagious Diseases Act was in force. ["Hear, hear!"] The other fact, my Lords, to which I would draw your attention, is the number of British soldiers who were found unfit to do their duty during the short time the Chitral expeditionary force was employed in 1895. That force consisted in round numbers of 6,000 British and 11,000 native soldiers. The troops selected were all medically examined before the expedition started, and about 8 per cent. of the British troops were weeded out as unfit for service on account of this most horrible form of contagious disease. The force crossed the frontier on April 3, and by July 31, less than four months, 957 British and only 294 native soldiers had been sent back sick to India. And Lieutenant-General Sir Robert Low, commanding the force, reported that this enormous excess of British soldiers was entirely due to contagious disease, not disease contracted locally, for the condition of affairs rendered that an impossibility, but the old disease breaking out afresh in consequence of the hardships and privations of a four months' campaign. In all other respects the British were as healthy as the native soldiers; so, taking the number of natives sent back as normal, the proportion of British should have been 160 instead of 957. Or, to put it in plainer language, 797 men, more than 13 per cent. of the British troops engaged, were rendered unfit for their duty as soldiers, and therefore a useless expense to the State, from what the majority of our medical officers call preventible disease. These figures, and those given in Lord Onslow's Report, alarming as I think, my Lords, you must consider them, for they show that one-fourth of the 70,000 soldiers serving in India are unable to take the field from contagious disease and its consequent disabilities, cannot be gainsaid. And they further prove how fallacious is the argument urged by the opponents of the Contagious Diseases Act, that the protective regulations enforced under that Act failed to mitigate the evil which caused them to be introduced. I know, my Lords, that those regulations did not work all the good that was hoped for, but this was not the fault of the regulations, but of the half-hearted manner in which they were applied. So apathetically were they brought into force that, although the Cantonment Act which legalised the regulations was passed in 1864, it was not until 1869, five years later, that Fort William and its environs were protected, although this is certainly the station most in need of precautionary measures on account of its immediate proximity to the City of Calcutta. Up to the last, 12 military stations in Bengal were left unprotected, and at three of those stations in 1879 the number of admissions to hospitals from contagious disease actually rose to upwards of 700 per 1,000 men. I think, my Lords, you must agree with me that it speaks well for the benefiical results of the Act that, notwithstanding these astounding figures were included in the total number of registered cases during the year, the proportion of men invalided was, as I have already shown, nearly four times greater in 1894 and 1895 than it was in 1879 and 1880. The truth is, my Lords, the Contagious Diseases Act was never given a fair trial in India. It was not believed in by the authority responsible to the Government of India for its being properly carried out, and, in consequence, no attempt was ever made to investigate the working of the Act or to ascertain what cases of disease were contracted within the area to which the Act applied, and what cases were contracted outside that area; so that even if every station in India had been brought within the scope of the Act, the good really done by the Act could not have been correctly appreciated from the returns furnished by the sanitary commissioner. Tables prepared from such unreliable data were bound to bring the Act into disrepute, and to strengthen the arguments of those who were, and are still, opposed to its introduction. Then, again, my Lords, the Act was administered in some places with zeal and intelligence by medical officers, in others it was carried on in a very perfunctory manner. When visiting Lock Hospitals I invaiably found that success was complete when the medical officer in charge took an interest in his work and satisfied himself that those who came for treatment were properly looked after. The disease under such auspices diminished rapidly, and at one station, where it had been extremely prevalent, it was almost entirely stamped out owing to the exertions of the medical officer. I am well aware, my Lords, that those who are opposed to the enforcement of the Contagious Diseases Act contend that direct interference is adverse to morality, and that, in all justice, the sinner should be allowed to reap the punishment of his sin. Although to my mind this is not a very Christian doctrine, I can understand and respect the horror of wrong-doing of which it is the outcome, provided the punishment could be confined to the sinner himself; but what I cannot understand is how any one can think it right to take no measures to prevent the spread of an evil which involves disease and misery on innocent women and children, and which must seriously injure equally innocent generations in the future. In my opinion it is as bad or worse than it would be to allow a mad dog to bite as many people as he felt inclined, or to permit a person known to have smallpox or diphtheria to mix freely with people in health. I say worse, because the evil in such cases might, at all events, be limited to those bitten or infected; while, in the other, it is impossible to calculate how far-reaching will be the deadly results of neglecting to take precautions. My Lords, we have to deal with human nature, and, in considering the question at issue, we must not lose sight of the fact that, year by year, several thousand young men, mere boys, indeed—freed from all moral restraint, arrive in India and are at once subject to great and peculiar temptations. For many months of the year they are necessarily kept within barracks from sunrise to sunset, only to emerge when darkness, which comes on so rapidly in the East, prohibits anything in the shape of such healthy recreation as out-door games. A great deal has been done of late years by the Government of India to enable the men to amuse themselves in a rational manner, by poviding comfortable and attractive reading-rooms, coffee shops, etc. These regimental institutes, as they are called, have helped to raise the tone of our soldies and to reduce crime, especially drunkenness, but they seem to have had, I regret to say, but little effect in preventing contagious disease, which, though it might have assumed still more gigantic proportions, had these counter-attractions not been provided, has, notwithstanding all that has been done in this direction, gone on steadily increasing, as your Lordships will perceive from Lord Onslow's Committee's Report. Other and more direct measures should now be resorted to. The disease under consideration ought to be treated as all other contagious diseases are treated. It is even more essential that precautionary measures should be adopted in regard to it than to any other disease, for, as stated in the Report of the Royal College of Physicians, dated March 23 last,

> "The constitutional form of the disease is one of the most serious, insidious, and lasting of all the contagious diseases that afflict humanity."

When it is prevalent there should be periodical examinations of all unmarried soldiers during their first period of service, and of older soldiers, if thought necessary, and any infringement of the order requiring men to report themselves on the first sign of becoming affected, should be severely punished. There ought to be no doubt as to the intention of these orders in the Army Regulations, but I am afraid that they are now frequently lost sight of and the importance of strictly enforcing them not thoroughly appreciated. With regard to women, I would leave the matter in the hands of the Government of India, on the distinct understanding, as stated in the Secretatry of State's Dispatch that "there must be nothing which can be represented as an encouragement to vice." In the interests of morality, and to protect, as far as is possible, young soldiers from temptation, women professedly belonging to a certain class should be forbidden to reside in regimental bazaars or follow regiments on the line of march. And in every military station all women, professionals or otherwise, known to have communicated disease to any soldier, should be obliged to submit to medical treatment and subsequent periodical examinations or to quit the station and its immediate neighbourhood. Each case of expulsion should be carried out in communication with the local civil authorities, who will, I trust, be empowered to take such further action as may be considered necessary for the protection of the community at large. To limit the Contagious Diseases Act (or whatever regulations the Government of India may think proper to introduce) to cantonments and to exclude the neighbouring cities and towns would, in my opinion, be altogether insufficient, and would certainly not get at the root of the evil. There must, of course, be some punishment, such as fine or imprisonment, for disobedience of orders, but my belief is that it would seldom have to be enforced if the women are kindly treated in the Government hospitals. The employment of women as coolies in the construction and repairs of barracks should be discouraged, but where this kind of labour is unavoidable, special precautions should be taken by means of civil and regimental police. These are surely only reasonable preventive measures, in the enforcement of which there should be little difficulty, for the calling of every person in a cantonment in India is well known. Boundary pillars mark off the space set apart for the soldiers' barracks, parade ground, and officers' quarters, and within these limits, at any rate, it is our bounden duty to protect the health of our soldiers, who, we must remember, are cut off from the pleasures and enjoyments of home life, and are compelled to live as single men for a certain number of years. If there is reason to suspect that the disease is contracted outside the cantonment limits, the country round should be put out of bounds and the number of men on duty as regimental police should be increased until matters improve. I have myself found this an effective way of checking the spread of this terrible scourge. I believe that much valuable assistance might be afforded by military chaplains if they would interest themselves in the matter. An excellent example has been set by the Rev. John Crauford, a Presbyterian clergyman at Meerut, who, a few years ago, established a "Purity Society" at that station for the benefit of soldiers, many of whom joined it, with the happiest results both as regards health and conduct. Something also might be gained by warning young and inexperienced soldiers, on first arrival in India, of the aggravated effects of immorality in such a climate, and its appalling results as can be seen at Netley Hospital. I am certain, too, that medical officers would be able to do a great deal towards the desired end if they were brought into closer communication with troops than they are at present. ["Hear, hear!"] They never now see or know the men as they did formerly, except those who come to them for treatment in hospital; and the cordial intercourse which used to exist between the combatant and medical officers and which was so conducive to good fellowship and to the general health of the Army—[cheers]—is, unfortunately, a thing of the past. I trust, my Lords, I have not wearied you. [Cries of "No!"] My excuse for taking up so much of your time is that the efficiency of the Army and the moral and material well-being of the soldiers I love so well are at stake. I beg you, my Lords, to give this painful subject your most careful consideration, and I earnestly hope that the British public may be induced to look upon it from a wise and prudent, as well as from a merciful and Christian point of view. [Cheers.]

*THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I am grateful to the noble Earl and the gallant General for the way in which they have handled what is unquestionably a very difficult subject. I do not think it can be denied that the disease and its effects have come to such a point that it is impossible to refuse a thorough inquiry into the whole matter. I do not think it is possible to read the papers which have been distributed to Members of this House without feeling that it is the imperative duty of the Legislature to look into the matter and see what ought to be done. ["Hear, hear!"] I think there is one class of of consideration which has not received full attention in either of the speeches we have listened to; it is quite certain that you cannot get to the root of such an evil as this without giving a very large part of your attention to the moral side of the whole question. The old regulations were objected to, and not a moment too soon, because they unquestionably had the effect of giving the impression to the soldiers that the sin in which they were indulging was not anything very wrong in itself, and that it was the business and purpose of the Government not to stamp the sin as an evil, but only to stop the effects of it. I do not think there can be any doubt that that was the only impression which could be made upon the soldiers at the time when it was the custom to provide for the indulgence of this sin by special establishments. It was a long time ago, but there still remains the same kind of impression. The authorities should make it very clear that they look upon this kind of indulgence as a very evil thing which is to be condemned by every good man and by every good soldier. If you can change the tone of the Army in that respect you will have done something towards getting rid of the evil. It can never be done by mere regulations, and if your regulations are of such a character as to maintain the belief that you do not really care about the wrong of the self-indulgence, and that you only want to have soldiers who can fight, depend upon it all your regulations will fall short of really extirpating the mischief. It is the habitual and continued indulgence that keeps up this mischief, and the temptation is increased by barrack-room conversation and the way in which the soldiers regard the sin itself. As long as that is the case you cannot have the co-operation of the men themselves in getting rid of the evil, and without their own co-operation it is hopeless to endeavour to raise any class of men to a higher position. If you leave out all this moral consideration, and think only of sanitary regulations as if they were really the complete remedy, every now and then you will find that your sanitary regulations will altogether fail. If there is to be an Inquiry it ought to go beyond the mere examination of the sanitary regulations that may be made, and should consider how you can get at the soldier's conscience and his habits of life. How very much more might be done, for instance, if a larger number of men were allowed to marry. It would no doubt cost you money, but it will not cost you as much as the present evil costs you. Something has been done, no doubt, to employ the soldiers and to keep their minds away from that sensuality which, when once men have allowed their imaginations to be affected by it, is sure to constantly recur to their minds. More may be done by occupying them in employment agreeable and interesting to them in their idle moments, and a great deal more than has yet been tried should be tried in this regard. I am only using this as an illustration of what I mean. I do not mean there are not many other things I could mention myself that could be done with this view. But what I want to emphasise is that in all that is done the moral impress made on the troops is to be one of the first considerations, and that whatever regulations you make you are doing, perhaps, benefit for the moment, but certain mischief for the future if you let soldiers think you do not care whether they are moral or not. ["Hear, hear!"] I think, my Lords, an Inquiry which looked into this side of the matter, with as much care as a medical man would naturally bestow upon the material side, an Inquiry of that kind would really be of great benefit. I do not propose to move any Amendment to the Resolution, or to vote against it. I believe that such an Inquiry as the noble Lord proposes, if only it be conducted by men who will look at both sides of the matter, and will be thorough-going in looking at the moral side, may be of the greatest benefit. Lord Kinnaird proposes to add something to the Resolution. The noble Lord seemed to deprecate the addition. I confess I do not see why it should be said such an addition will in any way interfere with the Inquiry proposed. It seems to me that if your Inquiry is to be of permanent value, you must extend it to the whole subject. My Lords, I cannot sit down without expressing my strong sense of deep gratitude to those who have brought this matter forward. I believe they have done no more than their duty. I believe that we may safely follow their lead, if only we are careful to see that the Inquiry proposed shall not be confined entirely to physical considerations, which will be dealing, not with the root of the evil, but only with the symptoms of it, and which will leave untouched that out of which the whole thing comes. If we can have an Inquiry which will avoid that, I believe it will be of the greatest use. My Lords, these young men who are so readily tempted to fall, come often from country villages, from the artisan class in the towns. They often have not lived very excellent lives before they enlist. Nevertheless, you do not find among them anything like the mischief you are now finding in your Army. And why? Because they have so much else to occupy their minds, because the moral influences around them are so much higher than the moral influences they find among their comrades when they join their regiments. They are protected by their surroundings, and soldiers are not. Look to it, and see whether something may not be done, something very real, to raise the whole tone of the Service in this matter. Lord Roberts pointed out to us various particulars in which he plainly aimed at that purpose. I thank him. I only wish to emphasise what he has said, and to press upon you that it is in that direction you must look if you desire to obtain permanent benefit. [Cheers.]

*The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (The Earl of Onslow) said he welcomed the contribution to the Debate that had just fallen from the most rev. Prelate, because he gathered from his remarks that he entirely agreed in the opinion already expressed that the magnitude of the mischief done was such that some steps must be speedily taken to put an end, if possible, to so terrible an evil. But when he joined with Lord Dunraven in desiring an Inquiry, he would suggest that the time for inquiry was past, and the time for action had arrived. ["Hear, hear!"] He hoped Lord Dunraven would not persist in his Motion for two reasons—first, because he thought any exhaustive Inquiry by a Committee or Commission might have the effect of leading some of those who were not prepared to take immediate action to point to the proceedings of the Inquiry as a reason for delay. Secondly, he hoped the Motion would not be pressed, because he hardly knew in what direction it would be possible to produce more facts or figures than those already available. The amount of literature on the subject was something overwhelming. Lord Dunraven asked that an Inquiry should be held into the effect of contagious disease on the forces of the Crown. Every year the Army Medical Department issued a Report which dealt with the affliction of the troops from these diseases in all parts of Her Majesty's dominions, whether they were Europeans, Asiatics, or Africans. Lord Dunraven desired that an Inquiry should be held into the effect of the disease upon the civil population. In the course of the Inquiry to which allusion had already been made he endeavoured to obtain from the principal hospitals in London and the large towns of England some information as to the proportion of these diseases to others, their influence upon others, and the increase of hereditary disease. But he found that statistics were not kept on these heads, and in many instances cases of venereal disease were not admitted. But if the noble Earl desired to find out what was the effect of the disease on the civil population, he had only to ask the superintendents of workhouses or the matrons of the women's hospitals or of the sick children's hospitals, or visit, he was sorry to say, the graves in our country churchyards, to be at once informed that the evil was rapidly increasing throughout the country. As to its effect on native races throughout Her Majesty's dominions, no fewer than five large volumes had been presented to Parliament, the result of inquiries made by governors and medical officers in all our colonies. Lord Dunraven asked for the regulations here and in other countries. The regulations in Great Britain were set forth in the Report of the Commitee of the House of Commons in 1882, and in the Inquiry he himself recently held he obtained from our Ambassadors abroad a statement of the regulations in existence in each of the European countries and also the regulations affecting the troops of those countries. If Lord Dunraven would be content with a Return giving that information, he would have pleasure in laying it on the Table, and he trusted that he would see that no further Inquiry was necessary. He would inform the House what had been the course of affairs during the last few years in India. In 1889 a new Cantonment Act was passed in consequence of a Resolution of the House of Commons in 1888. In 1892 instructions were issued by the Government of India for the strict observance of the rules under that Act. It was claimed that those rules were not strictly observed, and Lord Lansdowne, then Viceroy of India, while declaring that the Government of India at least had loyally carried out the Resolution of the House of Commons, said that local authorities might in some instances have evaded orders. In 1894 the Secretary for India ordered the introduction into the Viceroy's Council of a new Act to amend the Cantonments Act of 1889, and further rules eliminating this particular class of diseases from the infectious and contagious disorders, sufferers from which might be expelled from the cantonments, and imposing a fine or imprisonment on any public servant subjecting women to compulsory examination. The Government of India strongly protested against that course and said it was necessary to have power to exclude diseased women from the cantonments, or at any rate they must have power to exclude persons without giving a reason. But the Secretary of State was unable to agree in this view, and his sanction was refused to any rules which would have that effect. So matters remained until recently, when public attention was forcibly drawn to the alarming increase of the disease in India and its appalling consequences. Upon that the Secretary of State had written a Dispatch in which most Members of the House would be prepared to agree, and he should like to dwell on one or two of the conditions laid down, because he believed they would go a long way to meet not only the views of Lord Roberts, but also of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Government said they could not acquiesce in the continuance of the present state of things, and that common humanity, no less than their duty to the large body of British troops in India, demanded that some measures should be taken to restrain the prevalence of venereal disease. The Dispatch went on to say that there were certain things which must not be done—that was to say, there should be no approach to what had been called official purveying for immorality, but it gave power to the Government of India to expel from cantonments persons suffering from these diseases. It was quite true the result might be that there might be examination of women in some cases, but it would not be, as it was in the former case, compulsory, except in the same degree as it was now compulsory when a person suffered from smallpox, scarlet fever, or any of those diseases which the community had long since recognised to be a danger to public health. There were certain other measures which the Secretary of State had not yet prescribed, but which he had in his Dispatch invited advice from the Government of India upon. The first of these related to the taking of precautions to see that women were not employed about the barracks in the manner which Lord Roberts had shown had proved such a danger to the health of the soldiers. In the second place, the Secretary of State expressed to the Viceroy his desire to co-operate with him in every way in improving the moral and physical condition of the soldier. That was no new departure. For many years the Government of India and the Commander-in-Chief had been doing their best to improve the moral conditon of the soldier, and no one had done more than the noble and gallant Lord who had addressed their Lordships, and who had not only shown himself to be an incomparable captain in leading Her Majesty's forces against an Asiatic enemy, but had endeared himself to the common soldiers in India by the efforts which he had successfully made to improve their condition in all the commands he had held in that dependency. ["Hear, hear!"] He agreed with the most rev. Prelate that there was an opening not only for chaplains, but also for the commanding officers, to take this opportunity of inculcating upon the men under their command not only—as the Secretary of State had requested—the measures for the preservation of their health, but also impressing upon them the sin and wickedness of indulging in these vices. The Secretary of State desired that the practice which was already in existence of warning young soldiers by regimental and medical officers of the risks they ran should in future be made universal. He had every reason to believe that the measures which the Secretary of State proposed to take would be efficacious, and the Viceroy had telegraphed on behalf of the Indian Government that the proposals of the Government

> "Are in accord with our views, and, if sanctioned, will, we hope, enable us to combat successfully the spread of the disease."

One other important point the Dispatch dealt with was the remarkable fact that in some cantonments the disease had decreased, while in others it had increased to a great extent. It was not quite clear what was the reason for that variation between different stations, but he was inclined to agree with the explanation which had been suggested by Lord Roberts. The Government of India had been asked for further information upon this point. There was no reason to believe that women in India, any more than anywhere else, did not desire to be treated in hospital and regain their health, and he could not see upon what ground of Christian charity they could in any way say that the prevention of disease was not one of the first duties of a Government. ["Hear, hear!"] But how could they cure and how could they prevent disease if that disease was concealed? ["Hear, hear!"] It seemed to him the only course was to treat it like all other disease and compel the immediate notification of it. Some of those who, not long ago were most bitterly ranged against any preventive regulation now admitted that the time had arrived when something must be done. Their Lordships might have observed the letter in The Times from Lady Henry Somerset, in which she recognised that this horrible scourge had brought upon thousands of innocent women in England a load of suffering, and said that she gladly welcomed the Dispatch of the Secretary of State as a statement of inspiring and controlling principles never yet professed by any previous Government. That was not an isolated instance. A memorial had been presented to the Secretary of State and would shortly be made public, signed by a very large number of ladies of the highest position, philanthropists, nurses, superintendents, and matrons of hospitals, wives of doctors and clergymen, all praying that immediate action might be taken to check the spread of this terrible disease and the ravages it was inflicting among the population at home. They stated that preventive measures, if exercised with scrupulous care, did not cause any real danger to women, but constituted a valuable safeguard to women's virtue, and afforded a great opportunity of escape from a life of vice. He earnestly hoped the noble Earl would not press his Motion; but, whatever the result of that Debate might be, Her Majesty's Government felt that the time for action had arrived, and that it was necessary at once to take such steps as might seem to the Government of India and the Government in this country most likely to make a real and efficacious diminution in the disease. ["Hear, hear!"]

*LORD REAY said that he would move the adjournment of the Debate, if there was no objection on the part of the Government, as several noble Lords were anxious to speak on the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE replied that the Government had no objection to the adjournment of the Debate, which would be resumed as the first Order on Monday.

Debate accordingly adjourned to Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 14th May 1897.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 1) BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of this Bill,

MR. D. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) said that the Measure included five Provisional Orders, four of which related to England and one to Ireland. He had no objection to make to the confirmation of the English Provisional Orders, but he did object to the confirmation of that which related to Killala.

*MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member opposes the Bill, it will be postponed until another day.

MR. CRILLY wished to ask, on a point of Order, whether if the Bill were postponed, he would be allowed to state his objections to the Measure when it came before the House on a future occasion.

*MR. SPEAKER: Certainly, the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity of stating the grounds of his objections to the Bill.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) asked whether he would be in order in moving an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: The notice of the Instruction can be given, but the Instruction cannot be moved now.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

QUESTIONS.

CAPE GARRISON.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if a Roman Catholic chaplain accompanied the Irish troops now on their way to South Africa; and, was a Presbyterian clergyman sent with the Seaforth Highlanders to Crete?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Chaplains are not, as a rule, sent with troops proceeding to a colony. Officiating clergymen of the required denomination are employed in the colony to whatever extent may be found necessary. There are no Army chaplains of any denomination in South Africa. A Presbyterian clergyman was sent with the Seaforth Highlanders to Crete as there was no probability of finding there a clergyman who could officiate.

MR. T. M. HEALY asked why a distinction was drawn in this matter in favour of the Presbyterians and against the Roman Catholics?

MR. BRODRICK: Because the soldiers who happened to be sent to Crete were Presbyterians, and if soldiers of other denominations had been sent there we should have sent chaplains of those denominations.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Here are 800 Roman Catholic soldiers sent to South Africa. Why should not they have a Roman Catholic chaplain just as the Presbyterians who were sent to Crete have a Presbyterian chaplain?

Mr. BRODRICK: A Presbyterian chaplain was sent because there was not one in Crete. Had an Irish regiment been sent to the island a Roman Catholic chaplain would have been sent with it.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: Here are 800 Roman Catholic soldiers sent to South Africa without——

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is arguing upon the answer. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many of the 189 men and 272 horses drafted from other batteries to complete the three batteries under orders for the Cape were taken from the two batteries on the higher establishment and on the roster for foreign service; whether, although the 189 men and 272 horses were taken from 20 different batteries, no less than 27 horses and 53 men were taken from the 19th and 73rd field batteries, both of which were already under strength; and whether in case another brigade division be required for foreign service, it will be necessary to make up by drafts 63 per cent. of the men and nearly 90 per cent. of the horses required?

Mr. BRODRICK: Thirty-two men and 27 horses were transferred from the two batteries on the higher establishment, and those batteries were slightly under strength. Although 272 horses were taken from home batteries, 116 were met by exchange of horses from the batteries going abroad, those horses not being thought the best for foreign service. Only 156, therefore, were really taken from the home batteries, representing 38 per cent. of the strength of horses in the three batteries for South Africa. The men drafted from home batteries were 38 per cent. As batteries on foreign service require more men and horses than high-strength batteries at home, some transfers are inevitable.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER said that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the whole of his Question.

Mr. BRODRICK said that he believed he had done so.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER repeated a part of his Question as it stood upon the Paper.

Mr. BRODRICK said that all the material parts of the Question were replied to in his answer.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER rose amid loud cries of "Oh" and "Order" from Nationalist Members.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I rise to order, Mr. Speaker. We are stopped in putting questions, but the hon. Member opposite is allowed to go on. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member for North Louth is entirely out of order in making suggestions of that kind. [Cheers.] The hon. Member was stopped because he was arguing upon an answer. The hon. Member for West Belfast, as I understand, is strictly confining himself so far to the Question upon the Paper, and is stating that that Question has not been answered.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: He has risen four times. [Loud cries of "Order!"]

Mr. J. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.), who rose amid loud cries of "Order!" said, "Order yourselves!" [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

LOUGH MASK AND BALLINROBE CANAL.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if any decision has been come to with regard to the grant for the Lough Mask and Ballinrobe Canal?

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Gerald Balfour, Leeds, Central): No decision has yet been arrived at in this matter, which will be brought before the Congested Districts Board at its next meeting. I ought, perhaps, to add that the fuller reports received since the last Question of the hon. and learned Member on the 5th April are not altogether favourable to the project.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Major RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Department would allow managers to give an extra week's holiday during Jubilee week, as an exceptional case, without endangering the grants under Article 83 because the schools were not opened 400 times?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir JOHN GORST, Cambridge University): In ordinary cases the managers could easily give an extra week's holiday and still make 400 openings. Very exceptional cases, if any, would be dealt with on their merits.

COLONEL DALBIAC (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether arrangements can be made for the minor officials and messengers of the House of Commons to view the Jubilee Procession on the 22nd of June, as was done in 1887?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. A. AKERS - DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I am sorry to say that I cannot promise accommodation for the whole staff of the House to view the Queen's Procession. The arrangement of 1887 alluded to was a private one. If my hon. and gallant Friend can approach me with any similar proposal I will do what I can to meet him.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether a son of the Sultan of Turkey is coming to this country to take part in the Jubilee rejoicings; and if so, at whose invitation is the visit to be undertaken?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understand that the Sultan has, through the British Ambassador at Constantinople, announced his intention of sending a mission over on the occasion of the Jubilee. No invitations were issued.

GOVERNMENT OFFICES (SITES).

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works when it is proposed to summon the Committee on Government Offices (Sites)?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: In reply to the Question of the right hon. Baronet, I have to say that the Committee on Government Offices (Appropriation of Sites) will be called to choose a Chairman and to take evidence on Wednesday next.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. W. O'MALLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if his attention has been drawn to the resolution passed by the Clifden Board of Guardians, in which they complain of the very serious inconvenience occasioned by the fact that the mail arrives in Clifden an hour or more later every morning since 1st May, thus seriously affecting the delivery of letters through all parts of Connemara, and rendering it difficult. if not impossible, to reply to correspondence on the same day; and, whether he will take the necessary steps to remedy this state of affairs?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): Clifden cannot benefit, as most of the rest of Ireland does, by the accelerated day mail, because, though that reaches Galway 54 minutes earlier than it did, the car could still only reach Clifden about 7 p.m. too late for the return mail to leave the same day. It is, therefore, dependent upon the night mail which leaves Dublin and arrives at Galway 50 minutes later than formerly, in order to include the mails sent from other parts of Ireland via Dublin. The evening mail from Dublin to England is now 50 minutes later, and the mails to Dublin have been made 50 minutes later in order to share in this advantage.

MR. J. P. FARRELL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that there was a line of railway running in close proximity to Clifden?

MR. HANBURY said that was so, but the trains ran at very inconvenient times.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he will inquire from the Great Northern Railway Company the cause of the delay of the mid-day mails for Belturbet at Ballyhaise Junction; whether he is aware that the Cavan mails reach Cavan half an hour earlier than the Belturbet mails reach Belturbet, although the distance to Cavan from Ballyhaise Junction is longer than to Belturbet from the same junction; and, whether, if this is caused by any special train arrangement, or by shunting, or the like, he will ask the railway company to alter the arrangements?

MR. HANBURY: The mid-day mails for Belturbet are not, it appears, delayed at Ballyhaise Junction, but arrive at Belturbet at 11.10 a.m., only five minutes later than at Cavan. This is due to an alteration in the time tables, of which the London Post Office had no information when I stated on Tuesday last that the train reach Belturbet at 11.35—the time also stated in "Bradshaw." This means an addition of twenty-five minutes to the increased interval between the arrival and departure of the mail at Belturbet.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, with reference to the tenders recently invited by the Post Office for the conveyance of mails between Kinsale and Ballinhassig, could he state what the amount of the accepted tender was, and whether any lower tender was sent in; and, if so, what its amount was, and why it was not accepted?

MR. HANBURY: The lowest tender was accepted for the service in question, but the Postmaster General is not prepared to state the amount.

BROOKEBOROUGH PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he will direct a Return to be made to this House of the summons directed to James Kirkpatrick, on a charge of tracing hares, armed with a gun, which charge was heard and adjudicated on at Brookeborough, on the 2nd March 1897: together with the names of the magistrates who heard and decided the case, the name or names of the complainant or complainants, the names of the witnesses examined, and the penalty imposed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): No good purpose would be served by granting the Return referred to. I must therefore decline to direct it. Any party interested can obtain a copy of the entry in the order book of the magistrates, which contains all the particulars mentioned in the Question, and if as I have already stated in answer to a Question of the hon. Member, Kirkpatrick be in a position to show that any of the adjudicating magistrates were disqualified by interest, he can take proceedings to have the conviction quashed.

HONITON ELEMENTARY SCHOOL (HOLY WEEK).

MR. J. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Notts, Mansfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that on a day in Holy Week, and during school hours, the children in the only public elementary school in Honiton were marched through the town to a Church of England service, some of them being the children of Nonconformists who have claimed for them the benefit of the Conscience Clause, and who were not aware of the intention to take the children to the service; and, whether the Department will take steps to prevent the compulsory attendance of children at religious services in places of worship?

SIR J. GORST: The Committee of Council have no information on the subject, and have received no complaints.

CORK AND TRALEE PRISONS.

Mr. M. J. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain on what grounds 21 prisoners were transferred from Cork City Prison to Tralee Prison in December 1896; and, what is the cost to the Kerry ratepayers by the transfer of the prisoners and the escort of constabulary that accompanied them?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: There was nothing unusual in the movement of prisoners referred to; such transfers are effected from time to time when it is considered desirable to equalise prison populations. The expenses of transfer in all such cases, including cost of constabulary escort, are borne by the Prisons Vote.

ORMATHWAITE PROPERTY (LISTOWEL).

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that all the evicted tenants on the Ormathwaite property, situate near Listowel, have been reinstated with the exception of Thomas Walsh, although he has made the same offer for reinstatement as the others; and, on what grounds has his application for reinstatement been refused?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Three of the holdings from which the former tenants were evicted on this property, still remain unoccupied. I have no means of knowing on what grounds the landlord acted in refusing the application of Walsh for reinstatement.

MR. FLAVIN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that this man was the only exception on the whole property, that he had made an application to be reinstated and that no ground had been given for the refusal to reinstate him?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that if no ground for the refusal to reinstate the man had been given he did not see how he could be expected to give one.

MR. FLAVIN asked why the extra police were kept on the property at the cost of the ratepayers?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said he supposed that the extra police were kept on the property in the interests of peace. He had no further information to give on the subject.

MR. FLAVIN said that he should call further attention to the matter.

POSTAL DELIVERIES (IRELAND).

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, how it is intended to have house to house deliveries carried out in rural districts of Ireland; when will the new arrangements come into operation; and, when will rural auxiliaries get their pay for Sunday duty?

MR. HANBURY: Deliveries to unserved houses in rural districts of Ireland will be afforded partly by extending the walks of existing postmen and partly by employing additional postmen. The work will be put in hand without delay, but it will necessarily take some time to complete. The rate of pay for Sunday duty, i.e., payment at a rate and a half recommended by Lord Tweedmouth's Committee, will in all cases date from the 1st of April 1897.

DISCHARGE OF WEAVERS (BURNLEY).

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Burnley): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the particulars of the case reported in the local press where two sisters, young women employed in a weaving shed in the town of Burnley, one of whom, having been discharged without notice for reasons she thought insufficient, brought an action against the employers for wages in lieu of notice, and the employers, the day before the date fixed for the trial, paid the full claim and costs; whether he is aware that on the following day notice to quit was given by the employers to the other sister, without any cause of complaint whatever assigned against her, who, in spite of her repeated requests, refuse to give any reason to her in explanation of her discharge; and, whether he will cause inquiries to be made into the case?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley): The attention of the Secretary of State has not been called to this case except by the hon. Member's Question. There is no suggestion in the facts which the hon. Member states of any offence against the law having been committed, and this being so I am afraid there is nothing which calls for an inquiry on the part of the Secretary of State. It is obviously impossible for him to undertake to inquire into every case where workpeople are alleged to have been harshly treated by their employers, and even if he made inquiries he would have no power to interfere.

ST. ANDREWS UNIVERSITY.

MR. R. COX (Edinburgh, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been directed to a resolution passed by a majority of the University Court of St. Andrews on the 10th February 1897, suspending the operation of certain ordinances made by the University Commissioners, and confirmed by the Privy Council on the 15th January 1897, till the commencement of the next academical year; and whether the action of the University Court in suspending the effect of ordinances confirmed by the Privy Council is in accordance with law; and, if not, what steps the Executive Government intend to take in order to obviate the prejudicial effect to the University of St. Andrews and to University College, Dundee, of the said resolution?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): It having been brought to the notice of the Secretary for Scotland that certain individuals intended to test in the law courts the legality of the decision of the Privy Council with reference to the disputed ordinances, the opinion of the English and Scottish Law Officers of the Crown was taken, and acting on that opinion the Secretary for Scotland is now in consultation with the Treasury as to the course to be followed.

DOG LICENCE (DRUMLITHIE, KINCARDINESHIRE).

MR. J. W. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that Alexander Murray, who occupies the croft of Bogside, Drumlithie, Kincardineshire, and lets the farm as pasture for some 40 or 50 sheep, which he has to look after, has this year been refused an exemption from dog licence; and whether, seeing that the exemption has been granted for two years under similar circumstances, he will explain on what ground it is now refused?

MR. HANBURY: I understand that Mr. Murray is a tailor who is tenant of about eight acres of pasture. He owns no stock himself, but lets the pasture for sheep during the summer and autumn months. The field is well fenced, and the sheep are brought to it, and removed, when necessary, by the owners themselves. Mr. Murray was found to be in possession of a dog on the 3rd of March, and, as he declined to take out a licence, the Board of Inland Revenue considered that the case was one in which proceedings should be taken. It is true that an exemption was granted to Mr. Murray for the past year, but, now that the facts of the case are fully before the Board, they do not feel justified in continuing it.

AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in the event of the dropping of the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill, he can make any statement as to the way in which the Irish Government propose to use the money voted by Parliament as the Irish share of the aid grant for relief of rating in England; whether this sum is suspended simpliciter, or is at interest for the Irish benefit pending its appropriation; and whether any representation has reached him as to the advisability of appointing a Committee to inquire into the best means to be taken for spending the sum, or will it continue to remain as last year, in case the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill fails to pass?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: A Question similar to this stands on the Paper for to-day addressed to my right hon. Friend, the First Lord of the Treasury, by the hon. Member for West Islington. I understand my right hon. Friend will be prepared to make a statement on the subject, if not to-day, at all events in the near future. I must ask the hon. Member to wait for that statement.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

MR. J. H. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Technical Education Committee of a county or county borough, or in a county borough a school board supplying and managing higher grade and organised science schools, will be regarded as an organisation for the promotion of secondary education within the meaning of Section 7 of the Revised Science and Art Directory?

SIR J. GORST: The language of Section 7 was purposely left general by the Committee, and I do not think the interpretation put upon it by the Question would apply in all cases.

BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA (HEALTH).

MR. STUART-WORTLEY (Sheffield, Hallam): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has received any representative memorials or petitions from the general public on the subject of the proposals contained in his Dispatch of 26th March 1897 for improving the health of the British troops in India; and, if so whether he has any objection to make them public?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord GEORGE HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): I have received only two memorials which can be held to be representative of general public opinion on the subject of my Dispatch of 26th March 1897 regarding the health of British troops in India, and I have no objection to make them public. A few memorials have also been received from local meetings and societies, embodying protests against the action taken by Her Majesty's Government.

SEED POTATOES SUPPLY (IRELAND) ACT 1895.

MR. JOHN HAMMOND (Carlow): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Carlow Board of Guardians were compelled to pay to the Board of Works, Ireland, a fine of £15 15s. because of the delay of 10 days in repayment of the first instalment of a loan under the Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Act 1895; that this delay was caused solely by the absence of the clerk of the union on extended leave of absence owing to illness; and will he, having regard to the circumstances of this case, order that this sum of £15 15s. shall be refunded to the Carlow Board of Guardians?

MR. HANBURY: The charge in question is not a fine, but a charge for collection (of 1s. in the pound) levied under Section 6 of the Public Works Loans Act 1892 in cases where the repayment is more than 31 days overdue. I have repeatedly explained that interest on these seed loans is payable not by the Guardians but by the Church Fund, so if the fees for collection were not enforced, there would be little inducement to the Guardians to repay the loans. In this case the instalment (£315) was due on 31st July 1896. The Guardians were informed on that date that the fees would become due if it was not paid within 31 days. They met every Thursday during that period, and the clerk was absent on only two of them. Even if he had been absent on each of the four Thursdays, there is no reason why such a pressing matter of ordinary business should not have been brought before the Guardians by a subordinate. I see no special reason for making any exception in this case.

In reply to further questions asked by Mr. HAMMOND and Mr. FLYNN,

MR. HANBURY said that the instalments became payable in the month of August, and that it was a statutory charge.

HIGH SHERIFF (CARRICKFERGUS).

MR. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been called to the recent trial before the Lord Chief Justice of Ireland of an information at the suit of the Irish Attorney-General against Captain Conway Higginson for declining the office of High Sheriff of the county and town of Carrickfergus; and (2) whether it is the intention of the Government to deal with the question of the appointment to the office of Sheriff in Ireland during the present Session of Parliament.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The whole subject is now under the consideration of the Government, but I cannot, at present, make any statement in the matter.

WORMWOOD SCRUBS.

*MR. W. E. T. SHARPE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what decision has been arrived at by the War Department regarding a proposal to open a path across Wormwood Scrubbs, submitted by the London County Council on 26th October last?

MR. BRODRICK: The question of a path across the drilling ground at Wormwood Scrubbs presents considerable difficulty, but I hope to be able to communicate a decision to the London County Council in a few days.

POTATO CROP (IRELAND).

MR. P. McDERMOTT (Kilkenny, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) if his attention has been called to the extremely unfavourable prospects of the potato crop in Ireland; (2) whether he is aware that in many cases where the seed has been planted it has perished from the excessive rain, and that in nearly every district in Ireland the potato planting is a month later than usual; and (3) whether, as a recurrence of the potato disease may be obviated by spraying the crops, he will take steps in the poorer districts in Ireland to provide the necessary materials for those who are unable to obtain them, thereby preventing the serious risk of another potato famine in Ireland?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: It is a fact, I understand, that the planting of potato seed has been later than usual this season owing to the long continued wet weather, and I believe there is reason to fear that in some localities the seed has been injured by excessive rain. It is entirely premature, however, to express any opinion respecting the prospects of the crop generally. As regards the third paragraph, the matter will be brought under the notice of the Congested Districts Board.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the south of Ireland a large portion of the potato seed has failed?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir; I am not aware that that is the fact.

JOINT BURIAL COMMITTEES.

MR. J. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he is aware that legal difficulties have been raised with regard to the exercise of borrowing powers by Joint Burial Committees appointed under Section 53 of the Local Government Act 1894, and that, in answer to an application from the Horsham Burial District Joint Committee, the Board stated in August of last year that legislation would be necessary to meet those difficulties; and if the necessary legislation will be undertaken by the Government in the course of the present Session?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): The Local Government Board are aware that legal difficulties have arisen in connection with the matter referred to and the question of legislation on the subject is receiving consideration.

PERFORMING BEARS (STREETS).

COLONEL DALBIAC: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the numerous accidents which have recently resulted from the exhibition of performing bears in the streets of London and elsewhere; and whether there exists any law or police order under which these exhibitions can be put a stop to?

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: No such accidents have been reported to the Metropolitan Police or been brought to the notice of the Secretary of State from other districts. The matter is one which is provided for by law, and in regard to which the Metropolitan Police have suitable instructions.

SLAVERY IN ZANZIBAR.

MR. JOSEPH A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a copy of the Edict issued by the Sultan of Zanzibar relating to the abolition of slavery in the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba early in April will be laid at an early date upon the Table.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): Yes, Sir. A copy of the Decree will be presented almost immediately.

WESTMINSTER HALL.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether it has been brought to his notice that during the Easter Recess many excursionists were disappointed through Westminster Hall being closed to the public except on Monday and Tuesday; and whether he will consider the advisability of permitting the public to view the Hall between the hours of 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. during the whole of the Whitsuntide Recess instead of upon two days only?

MR. AKERS-DOUGLAS: I regret to find that, owing to a misunderstanding of the new regulations, Westminster Hall was closed to the public on certain days in Easter week. I have communicated with the police authorities desiring that the public may be admitted daily throughout the year, at any hour, between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. at which Parliament is not sitting. This order will not apply to Sundays, Christmas Day, and Good Friday.

ROYAL MARINES (RESERVE).

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether their Lordships have approved of any proposal or formulated any scheme for the formation of an effective reserve of men formerly serving in the corps of Royal Marines, as stated to be under consideration in the speech of the First Lord on Naval Estimates; and if he can give the particulars to the House of such scheme?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): A scheme for a reserve of men from the corps of Royal Marines is at present being prepared by the Deputy Adjutant General. It has not yet reached a shape in which to be submitted to the Board for approval, but I think I may already say that I foresee no great difficulties in the adoption of an effective plan. Some legislation may be necessary.

LAUNDRY WORKERS.

MR. D. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a memorial recently presented to the Home Office by the Christian Social Union relating to the hours of labour and general conditions of employment of women in laundries; and, whether he will consider the desirability of introducing into any future legislation upon the subject provisions dealing with the state of facts disclosed in the memorial?

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: The Secretary of State has received the memorial in question, and will certainly consider the representations made in it when the time comes for further revision of the Factory Acts.

CIVIL (UNCOVENANTED) SERVICE (INDIA).

MR. GORELL BARNES (Kent, Faversham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, with reference to the Dispatch of the Government of India, dated 20th September 1893, on the leave and pension rules of the Civil (Uncovenanted) Service, published in a Return to an Address of this House, dated 11th August 1896, full consideration will be given to the dissenting Minute of Sir Alexander Miller, Legal Member of the Viceroy's Council: and whether a copy of that dissenting Minute, which is referred to at page 32 of the said Return, can be laid upon the Table of the House.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: No separate dissent was recorded by Sir Alexander Miller. His views were expressed in the third paragraph of the letter from the Government of India referred to by the hon. Member, and were fully considered at the time by the Secretary of State in Council.

CRETE.

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when further Papers on the affairs of Crete will be presented; and, to what date the next batch of Papers will come?

MR. CURZON: Further Papers on Crete, carrying the narrative of events up till the end of April, are in active course of preparation, and will be laid at the earliest possible date. I hope that this may be during the course of the next fortnight.

PARLIAMENTARY VOTERS' LISTS (REVISION).

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the attention of the Postmaster General has been called to the great expense caused to political organisations in connection with the revision of lists of parliamentary voters by the amount of the registration fee charged on notices of objection sent by post, viz., 2d. in addition to 1d. postage, i.e. 3d. postage on each objection; whether he is aware that the registration fee on these notices was fixed at 2d. as a concession at a time when the registration fee of ordinary letters was 4d.; whether a notice of objection, if sent by post in the ordinary way, would require more than ½d. postage; and, whether, in view of the fact that the work of parliamentary registration is of a public character, he will consider the advisability of reducing the postage on objections to ½d. and the registration fee at 1d., being half the ordinary registration fee as originally intended?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General's attention has not previously been called to the subject referred to by the hon. Member, but he is aware that the registration fee on notices of objection was fixed at 2d. by the Parliamentary Voters Registration Act 1843, at a time when a higher registration fee was charged on ordinary letters. The work prescribed by the statute in reference to these notices is not the same as that involved in the ordinary registration of a letter, and the Postmaster General will consider whether it will be possible for the special registration fee of 2d. to be reduced. With respect to the postage as distinguished from the registration fee, notices of objection have already been admitted to the half-penny rate of postage where they conform to the authorised definition of a circular.

DEPORTATION OF PAUPERS.

Mr. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, (S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he can state on what grounds the Scotch Office declined to nominate a representative to act on the Committee of Inquiry suggested by the Local Government Board for Ireland regarding the deportation of paupers from Scotland to Ireland?

*The LORD ADVOCATE: I must ask the hon. Member for longer notice. If he will put it down for Monday, I shall endeavour to give him an answer.

LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. PATRICK M'HUGH (Leitrim, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a Land Sub-Commission sat in Manorhamilton in March and disposed of 57 cases, but that up to the present no decision has been given in any of these cases; and when will the decisions in these cases be given?

The Hon. Member also asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, if he were aware that a large number of originating notices were served in the Manorhamilton district of county Leitrim so far back as November which have not yet been dealt with; can he state when these cases will be dealt with; and will he see that no unnecessary delay occurs?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The present Manorhamilton list, the hearing of which was commenced on the 9th of March last, contained all cases from that Union in which applications to fix fair rents were received prior to the 1st day of December 1896. 57 of these cases have been heard at Manorhamilton, but the lay Assistant Commissioners have not yet been able to complete the inspection of all these holdings. The inspection is being proceeded with as rapidly as is possible, and judgments will be given by the Sub-Commission in the cases referred to on the earliest possible opportunity.

INEBRIATES (REFORMATORIES).

Dr. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W).: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is his intention to introduce, during the present Session, the Bill for the establishment of reformatories for inebriates, mentioned in the Queen's Speech; and, if he does so, whether he will include in it arrangements for the reception of habitual offenders in labour settlements, as recommended in the Departmental Committee (1895) on Habitual Offenders, Vagrants, Beggars, Inebriates, and Juvenile Delinquents (Scotland), and the Report from the Departmental Committee on Prisons (1895)?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: No, Sir; I do not think that there is any probability that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will be able to introduce a Bill on this subject during the present Session.

Dr. FARQUHARSON asked whether, if time could not be found for the introduction of the Bill in that House, the right hon. Gentleman would arrange for its introduction in the House of Lords?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I will consult with the Home Secretary upon the point.

POOR RELIEF IRELAND (BILL).

Mr. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, after the almost unanimous vote of the Irish Members that was given on Thursday night, that the money that had been allocated to Ireland in 1896 should go to the relief of rates, it is the intention of the Government to proceed with the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill and the Agriculture and Industries (Ireland) Bill, under which this money would be allocated to other purposes; and if not, whether the Government are prepared to reconsider the position taken up on Thursday night, and make provision for the reduction of agricultural local rates in Ireland on the same basis as has already taken place in England and Scotland?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member an answer to-day; perhaps he will defer the Question until Thursday next.

Mr. LOUGH asked whether it would not be reasonable to postpone the Vote for the Irish Local Government Board, which was down for that evening, until the Government should have determined whether or not the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill would be proceeded with.

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I do not think that the Estimates for the year are relevant to the Question of the hon. Member. I may remind him that the Vote to which he refers is put upon the Paper to-day in accordance with the desire of the Irish Members.

ROYAL PATRIOTIC FUND.

Mr. ARTHUR BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in giving effect to any of the recommendations of the Select Committee on the Royal Patriotic Fund, Her Majesty's Government will favourably consider including within the scope of the fund the case of widows of Crimean Officers who rose from the ranks?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: After inquiry I find that the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund are of opinion that the very numerous applications, already amounting to nearly 1,000, from the necessitous widows of petty officers and non-commissioned officers of the Navy and Army who come within the scope of the Commissioners' powers as recently extended, make it impossible for them to hold out any hope that they can extend their operations to the cases of widows of commissioned officers.

SUPPLY (WAR OFFICE VOTE).

Sir A. F. ACLAND-HOOD (Somerset, Wellington): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it will be convenient to put down the War Office Vote for the first Friday in July?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I do not think it would be convenient to give a pledge so far in advance with regard to the allocation of a day for discussing this vote. Perhaps my hon. and gallant Friend will repeat the question at a subsequent time.

MOTION.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (IRELAND) ACT (1877) AMENDMENT.

Bill to amend the Supreme Court of Judicature (Ireland) Act 1877, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Maurice Healy and Mr. Dane; presented accordingly, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 253.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.

[EIGHTH ALLOTTED DAY.]

Class III.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £68,431, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1898, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Irish Land Commission."

Mr. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet) drew attention to the necessity of some steps being taken with a view to keep some check on the gentlemen who were going about the country cutting down rents—[ironical laughter]—on no evidence whatever. Rents were being cut down in a reckless manner and on no solid ground. Almost every reduction was accompanied by a simultaneous rise of the selling value of the occupation holding. [Ironical laughter.] When this legislation was introduced they were told that the object which the Government had in view was to enable the occupiers of the soil to retain their holdings on conditions which would allow them to conduct their business at a profit, to live and thrive on their holdings. But time after time holdings had been brought into Court with the result that rents had been cut down, and then the tenants immediately sold their holdings to some one else, receiving a large premium for their interest. This, he maintained, defeated the object of Parliament. This premium was obviously taken out of the landlord's pocket; and if this were to go on it was obvious that Parliament was robbing the landlord of what was his property, and for which other persons were prepared to pay a substantial premium. The incoming tenant who bought the holding, and gave an enhanced price for it, had in a great majority of cases to borrow the money to pay the premium; he paid interest at the current rate, and this was a good deal more than the holders of Consols received.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was in order in discussing the policy of the Act of 1881 on this vote.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: No. I do not think it would be in order to discuss the policy, except so far as the action of the Assistant Commissioners is concerned.

Mr. JAMES LOWTHER said this was what he was doing. Parliament had been under the impression that the persons who would be employed would exercise judicial functions in a judicial spirit and that the reduction of rents would be fair and reasonable. His contention, on the other hand, was that these persons had been keeping their eyes on the popularity which might attach in some quarters to the wholesale cutting down of rents, by means of which wholesale robbery had been perpetrated. An occupier 15 years ago was in a better position with regard to his annual outgoings in respect of the land than the tenant was now after two processes of wholesale reduction of rents. These gentlemen were known some years ago by the name of "sub-confiscators;" and these were the "chief confiscators," who disregarded every judicial attribute and simply endeavoured to make friends with mammon—[laughter]—insuring their own reappointment by making themselves popular with the class which they thought possessed the largest share of political interest. What, in these circumstances, did the Government propose to do? He thought they ought to have some data by which Parliament could decide whether or not it was the duty of the State to make recompense to those who had been robbed. He hoped the right hon. Gentlemen who represented the Irish Office would be able to assure them that the Government intended to hold an inquiry. He maintained that a great wrong had been done.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that so long as this country maintained its Free Trade policy in the extraordinary way in which it was maintained, he had no doubt that reductions of rent would continue to be given in England and in Ireland. He should like to say one word to correct the right hon. Gentleman. He was entirely in error in supposing that there was a large demand for the purchase of holdings in Ireland. Except in the case of small holdings of five or six acres, there was practically no demand. He challenged any landlord to put up for sale a farm of 100 acres with a fair rent fixed near even large cities like Dublin or Cork. He did not profess to understand Down or Antrim; but he declared for such a farm they would get nothing. Where high prices were given for small farms they were generally given by retired policemen or by men who had made a little money not out of land. ["Hear, hear!"] These high prices were given generally by fools who know nothing about land. They would make more if they put their money in the savings bank. [Laughter.] But he had never been able to understand the outcry as to the reductions of rent in Ireland when the Scotch rent reductions received not a word. Under the Crofters Act there was power to remit arrears, and they found the Crofters getting 50 and 60 per cent. reductions; and then on the second judicial term, as in Orkney, there was a further reduction of 17 per cent.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: But they do not sell their tenant-right.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The Scotch never had the common-law right of free sale. The great prevailing influence in Ireland was fixity of tenure. He regretted that the Land Commission had not given them a Blue-book. Every year the Scotch Crofters' Commission issued a Blue-book giving full details, and he wished the Irish Land Commission would do the same. As to the reductions made by the Sub-Commissioners it did not lie in the mouths of the Party opposite to attack these gentlemen. He had gone into the matter, and he found that, with three exceptions, every one of the existing Sub-Commissioners had been appointed by a Tory Government. As to the Head Commissioners, Mr. Murrough O'Brien was the only one appointed by a Liberal Government, and he was now never consulted under the majority rule. He never pitied any man more than he pitied the Chief Secretary, with whom rested the appointment of these 80 gentlemen. He himself had received 3,496 applications—[loud laughter]—therefore, he could imagine what had happened to the Chief Secretary. ["Hear, hear!"] But what had the Chief Secretary done? Out of 80 appointed three were Catholics. [Cries of "Oh!"] Something like 76 were landlords or land agents. He did not believe that more than three of the 80 had any connection with the tenant farmers; and these were the Sub-Commissioners they complained of. The reductions were not half enough, and if Free Trade continued they would have to be increased. It was only because the Irish farmers were used to a lower rate of subsistence than the English, and because their daughters and sons gave their labour, that so many rents were paid. If the boys and girls had been paid for their work, not one-tenth of the rents which the Sub-Commissioners called fair would have been paid. Now, however, the young peopl were going to America, where they could get paid for their labour, with the result that after 60 years' reign Her Majesty would find the population of Ireland reduced to one-half of what it was when she came to the throne. It was idle for the landlords of Ireland to make an outcry against the Sub-Commissioners, almost every one of whom were of the same religion, race, and blood as the landlords, and who gave their decisions with very bad grace. What could be more extraordinary than the Prime Minister's recent allocution? Supposing that, while the Coercion Act was in greater vigour than it was now, some of the people who were suffering under its operation had come to the Prime Minister and said: "Oh, your sentences are very hard, your plank beds are even harder still, and really these removable magistrates are behaving in a most atrocious manner!" Did any one suppose that the Prime Minister would have thrown dirt on his own statute, that he would have said: "Agitate in England, address meetings in England, expose your grievances, show them how often you have been sent to prison, explain the plank bed, bring a model of the battering-ram along with you"—[laughter]—"and rouse the great heart of England as to your grievances"? The tenants had no men to speak for them in the House of Lords and but few men in the House of Commons. The majority in both Houses was permanently arrayed against the Irish people. The landlords had the whole of the House of Lords and about three-fourths of the House of Commons with them, and yet Lord Salisbury had advised them to go on platforms and explain their grievances. If they were to believe The Times—though he did not think that an organ to which they ought to attach much credence—the Government had resolved to appoint a committee of experts. A more fatal policy could not be devised. Already there was in fair rent cases the right of appeal and of a counter-appeal. Were they going to throw the whole thing into the melting pot and call up the Sub-Commissioners, the Chief Commissioners, and the Judges of Appeal, and ask them to explain the grounds upon which they had reduced Pat Doolan's rent from £10 to £8? In 1882 Mr. Justice O'Hagan and Mr. Commissioner Litton refused before a Select Committee of the House of Lords to state the grounds of their legal decisions, but neither of them was sent to the Clock Tower. Upon this occasion Lord Salisbury had condemned a Select Committee—who, however, could send for persons, papers, and records, and could commit for contempt—as an unsuitable tribunal for re-trying this matter. Was it then to be committed to a Royal Commission who had no power to send for witnesses, to take evidence upon oath, or to send anybody to gaol? Surely that would be a feebler tribunal than a Select Committee. And if a Royal Commission were appointed, who could be got to serve upon it? Landlords and tenants could not serve upon it, neither could Members of either House of Parliament, because they were supposed to be prejudiced from some one point of view or another. Were tinkers or tailors, who had no interest in the land question, to form the Commission, or were the Government going to bring the Scotch Crofting Commissioners down to go into the Irish land question? He had seen it stated that Mr. Clare Sewell Read and Mr. Pell should be appointed, but they could know nothing about the price of bog-land in Connaught, although they knew everything about high scientific cultivation in this country. After all, there was no good in quarrelling with the Land Commission, except from the point of view that they did not give large enough reductions. He saw no solution for the present condition of the landlords except through some system of purchase. Land in Ireland had reached the low-water mark, and very soon it would barely pay the rates, especially if the Government insisted upon not paying half the rates as they now did in England. The present reductions of rent were the slow but grudging acknowledgments which the sub-Commissioners had been obliged to make of an economic condition which had been produced, not by agitation, not by unrest, not by dishonesty—for the Irish people were amongst the best payers of rent—but by a series of laws which year after year this Parliament had been good enough to pass for Ireland.

Mr. EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said he did not intend to go at any great length into the Irish Land Question because he was tired of bringing it before the House and the Government. Notwithstanding what the hon. and learned Gentleman had said, his view was that the present condition of the Irish landlords was entirely the result of the fact that they had no political power whatsoever. He regretted to say that his view of the English parties was that, while they were always quite willing to take any extraneous advantage or assistance they might get from Irish landlords, or from those who sympathised with them, they were never prepared to show any sympathy with Irish landlords in return. After all, the Irish landlords had no political power which would enable the English landlords to be kept in power; and so it was that whenever they raised this question in the House of Commons they got occasionally, as they were going into the lobbies, a few encouraging words from Members on that side of the House, who said: "We heartily sympathise with you; but you know we must vote with the Government." [Ironical Irish cheers.] That was his experience of that House, and so far as he was concerned, whether it was the property of the Church or of the brewers that was attacked in that House, for the future he should always take what was best for Ireland in reference to any question, and solely in regard to that he should give his vote. [Nationalist cheers.] The truth of the matter was, he was really tired of being talked of as an Irish Conservative when it suited the English Conservatives, and of being deserted by the English Conservatives just when it suited them. [Irish cheers.] What was going on at the present moment in Ireland? He would give the House a few figures. He had before him an extract of the rents that were fixed in December last. The total original rents dealt with by the Commissioners were £16,826, and the valuation was £12,543. On the first statutory term it was fixed at £13,239, or a little over the valuation: but on the second statutory term what was originally £16,826 was reduced to £9,553, or about one-third less than the tenement valuation upon which the taxes were fixed, and in relation to which that House had refused any relief to Ireland. That was a specimen of what the landlords were suffering. ["Hear, hear!"] When they found that by their legislation the rents of the Irish landlords had been reduced to that extent, he unhesitatingly said that a serious condition of affairs had arisen in that country. He should like to know, if the same method of valuation went on through the various successive periods fixed by the Land Acts, what would be left to the landlords after one more valuation. [" Hear, hear ! "] It was all very well to tell him that there were also great rent reductions in England. No doubt there were, but the two cases were entirely different. In the first place, if there were reductions in England the landlord gave them voluntarily, and if he did not he got back his land. In Ireland there was no such power to get back the land. By the action of that House—and he said this as not in the least grudging the reduction the tenant had got if it was a just reduction—they had taken away an elementary right of property from the landlord. If, for the benefit of the State and of the public, they wished to give his land to somebody else at a rent which they themselves fixed, then at once, unless they were prepared to compensate him, they raised the question of having confiscated a right which he had just as much as he had in any other kind of property. [" Hear, hear ! "] That being so, he said a grave question had arisen in Ireland. And while no one knew better than he did, that in the past many tenants in Ireland had had a hard time and a hard life, and had lived upon a standard of livelihood which probably would almost be unknown to people of a similar class in this country, they must not imagine that there were not people connected with the land-owning class in Ireland who had not gone through hardships which, if not greater, were at least equal to those of the tenants. He received, day after day, letters from Ireland, which he believed would almost draw tears to the eyes of the very hardest, in connection with this question, from people tenderly and genteelly educated and brought up, who, through no fault or extravagance of their own, had been deprived absolutely of the means of subsistence. He had known of cases of men of great education and of great ambitions who had died in the garrets of London absolutely of starvation in consequence of the condition this Irish land question had come to. Therefore, if there were cases of hardships on the one side, there were also such cases on the other, and he said it was a reproach to this country and to the Union under which they lived that when, for the sake of governing Ireland, they deemed it necessary to pass these laws, they asked, as the price of the maintenance of that Union the starvation of those with whom they had been associated and with whom they sympathised. [Irish Unionist cheers.] Of course, he was not in a position to attack these reductions if they took the rent from an economic point of view. He could not tell whether these rents were just or not. They had set up a system which debarred them from admitting that they were just reductions, and that was his case. He had put question after question to the Chief Secretary—and he did not for a moment suppose that his right hon. friend was in the least lacking in sympathy with his view—as to what were the reasons for these reductions, and the Chief Secretary had told him that the Land Commissioners' Court were not bound to give any reason for the reductions they made. No, they gave their judgments, which they communicated by means of a halfpenny post-card to the agent, and they absolutely declined to give any reasons. He said that such a system as that was a monstrous absurdity, and it was ridiculous to talk of any such system of Courts as was set up for this purpose being regulated by the ordinary procedure which was adopted in any Court of justice, whether in this or in any other country [" Hear, hear ! "] He would tell the House why no reasons were given, and this was what, he thought, lay at the whole root of this matter. No reasons were given because the moment they departed from contract and from market value they could set up no standard except a standard of guesswork ; and when they selected a number of men and asked them to fix what was a fair rent, what were they to start from ? The truth of the matter was that the system was an absolutely impossible one, and let them not pretend, whatever might be the result, that they were voting this £127,000 for the purpose of paying these Courts as a matter of justice or as a judicial matter. Let them acknowledge the whole thing as a farce, as of course it was, and deal with it accordingly.

["Hear hear!"] It might be necessary, he did not say it would not, further to reduce rents in Ireland. It might be necessary to the peasantry of Ireland, with other people in this Empire, to adopt a higher standard of living than they had hitherto lived. If that were so, then a grave question faced the State. But let the State face the question and not be afraid of it, and let them not have, time after time, as the only one act of statesmanship towards Ireland that they ever knew of in the House, a Land Bill depriving the landlord of the last remnant of his property. A good deal was said by the hon. and learned Member for Louth about the appointment of these Sub-Commissioners. He was not going to attack the appointment of the Sub-Commissioners. He thought the applications for recommendations which came to him amounted, if not to thousands, at any rate to hundreds; but he recommended none of them, and he knew none of the gentlemen who were appointed. He was not going to attack them, for the simple reason that these gentlemen had been put in the position of having to perform an impossible task. This was the problem which confronted his right hon. Friend. He was told to find in Ireland 90 men who, without any guidance from the Act, without any standard set up, were to fix up what each one of them at his own sweet will thought a fair rent. He was not going to attack these men — it would be cowardly to do so. The thing to be attacked was the system set up by the Acts of Parliament. ["Hear, hear!"] When they were considering the claims of the Irish landlords they could not leave out of sight the large sums that were being paid every day for tenant-right. It was ridiculous that a man should have his rent reduced say £50, and immediately afterwards go into the open market and sell exactly what that £50 was worth. That was simply transferring the property from the landlord to the tenant. He would give the House an example of the method in which this operated. He saw the other day in a newspaper an advertisement offering for sale the tenant's interest in a farm. It announced Griffith's valuation—i.e., the valuation for rating purposes; it announced the old rent, it announced that some 30 or 40 per cent. had been taken off by the Commission, and it invited the public to come in and bid for the value of the tenant's interest. That was not all, for there was an important postscript:—

> "N.B.—The first statutory term will shortly expire, and then the tenant will be able to again go into Court and have his rent further reduced."

There was no question of improvements arising; these had been all taken into consideration upon the first statutory term; but it was an invitation to the public to come in and compete, and one of the baits held out was that the rent would be still further reduced when the first term expired. He admitted that the high prices given for farms in Ireland arose a great deal from what might be called a land-hunger. ["Hear, hear!"] He admitted it, and it would be quite untrue to put it in any other way. But what did that mean? It meant that where, in England, a man who did not wish to stay upon his farm, could go to the manufacturing towns and get employment for himself and his children—["Hear, hear!"] But in Ireland that was not the case, the farmer must stick to the land. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, but how was that to affect the landlord? The fact was that, by reason of the special circumstances of Ireland, land was more valuable than in England. But if, for reasons of the state, the tenants were to be prevented from paying high rents, was it fair to put the whole burden and disadvantage on the landlords? Surely not. ["Hear, hear!"] When the Land Acts were passed in 1881 they were told that the administration of them would be perfectly safe, because the House was prepared to appoint a Land Commission which would command every possible respect, by reason of the status of the three Head Commissioners. He said nothing of these three Head Commissioners personally, but he said that the whole register of appeal administered by the Commissioners was an absolute farce. What was the appeal? The Commissioners were paid some £3,000 or £3,500 a year, and what did they do? When a case for the settlement of rent went down it first came before the Sub-Commissioners, two of whom were laymen supposed to be acquainted with land and the other was a legal Commissioner.

The two Agricultural Sub-Commissioners went out and valued the land. Now what was this appeal for which the country was paying so much? What the three Commissioners simply did was this. Having received the assessment of rent made by the lay Commissioners, simply meant that two Sub-Commissioners sit in judgment upon the rent fixed by the other. [An HON. MEMBER "No, no —two."] Well, take it to be two. It simply meant that two Sub Commissioners who had heard the case, had to appeal to two Sub Commissioners who had never heard the case at all. [Laughter.] And then as to the appeal, what happened was this. You went into the Appeal Court and you found a Judge of the High Court presiding with all the dignity of a Judge of the Queen's Bench—Mr. Justice Bewley; they found sitting by his side Mr. Commissioner Fitzgerald, also a lawyer, originally a county court judge, who was appointed he believed by Mr. Gladstone; and they found also Mr. Wrench, who he believed was an expert in the breeding of hackney horses. [Laughter.] There they sat in solemn state, that was, if the three of them happened to be present, and what occurred was this. The Judge would say, "Have you read the report of the Sub-Commissioners who have valued this farm?" and if you said "Yes," he would say, "Do you think, after that, that it is necessary to hear this case?" [Laughter.] That was the whole procedure, day after day, with hundreds of thousands of pounds depending upon it—the whole procedure for which they were going to vote this £125,000 to-day, or at all events a considerable portion of it. He maintained, and he believed that if any one of these three judges who were drawing salaries could be got at in a confidential humour when not sitting in court, he would admit that the whole thing was absolutely ridiculous. And that was what they were asked to pay for to-day, or that the country was asked to pay for.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Their vote is from the Consolidated Fund.

MR. CARSON: No doubt, but there were the Sub-Commissioners who value, and other officials. Why, what did they do but read up the Sub-Commissioners' reports? While he said that as regarded these gentlemen, let him say again that the system they had set up was an impossible one. Nobody would deny that Mr. Justice Bewley, as a lawyer, was an absolutely competent man and a perfectly fair and upright judge; he was a man of distinguished learning, who had held very high positions before he went on the Bench. That he admitted, but it was only in an occasional case that these questions arose, and as regarded the rest of the system, what he had described to the House—ridiculous as it appeared —was absolutely what took place in the Land Court if any of these decisions were appealed against. How long then was this system to go on? Hon. Members opposite might say that he was throwing out a bait for their assistance. Well, if the House liked to say so, be it so. It was perfectly true that he should be glad to have their assistance, and he thought that a scheme might be very easily devised—that was, if this great English Government were prepared to deal with liberality——

MR. T. M. HEALY: Do you want a fresh Land Act?

MR. CARSON: A scheme might be easily devised which might confer great benefits on the tenants, and at the same time enable the landlords to find some salvation. That naturally brought him to the second question, the question of purchase. It had always been put forward by consecutive Governments that the real solution of this land question in Ireland was purchase. All he could say was that the reports which reached him of the methods in which the Purchase Acts were carried out were anything but satisfactory. The Land Commission, in dealing with purchase, whereas in reality they ought to grease the wheels, so to speak, did everything they could to clog them. [Nationalist cheers.] To use the phrase of the hon. and learned Member, they were always higgling about small matters. A case came under his notice the other day, where a landlord and tenant had agreed for the sale and purchase of a farm for the sum of £220, which to the tenant would have meant an immediate reduction of some 20 per cent. upon the judicial rent already fixed. But the valuers were sent down, and so accurate were they in their diagnosis of the land that they refused to advance the £220, but said they would advance £200, knocking off the £20. The landlord, rather than have the matter go off, agreed to accept the £200. What was the result? Within a fortnight the tenant sold the farm in open market for £450. So much for the judgment of the Land Commission. He mentioned the incident merely as showing this—that if they wanted purchase to really succeed—and it was under purchase that the tenant got by far the greatest benefit—they must be deliberate in the way they administered these Acts. A case happened only the other day of a collision between the two Courts—the Land Commission and the Land Judges' Court. The Land Commission had valued some farms at £5,000; and just as the thing was about to be settled the Land Judges' Court said they did not think it was worth more than £3,000. So that they had the valuers of one Court valuing an estate at nearly £6,000, and those of another valuing the same estate at half the sum. The Land Commission Court seemed to think that its sole mission was to underestimate the value of land and to subtract as much as possible from the landlords' interest. There was a case in which a tenant applied to his landlord for leave to sell his farm in open market for £500. The landlord, thinking that £500 was too much for an incoming tenant to pay, exercised his right of pre-emption. The Sub-Commissioners then went down to fix the sum which the landlord ought to give for the tenant's interest, and they fixed it at £800, or £300 more than the tenant could have obtained in open market. Did the Government suppose that the landlords and those connected with them could rest satisfied while cases of that kind occurred? There was something in The Times of that day about the intention of the Government to grant a Commission. If it were the fact, as he believed, that rents were being fixed without any standard, and that the Land Acts were being administered to the detriment of the landlords on all occasions, there certainly ought to be an inquiry without delay. He knew that no one became a "bore" in that House sooner than a man who appeared to have a subject upon the nerves; but he felt sure that if hon. Members only knew as much as he did of the sufferings of many of the landlord class in Ireland, and of the privations of their families, whom they could not educate in accordance with their station in life, the House would pardon him for having asked once more for justice for these people. [Cheers.]

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said that he had never heard a more crushing indictment of English rule in Ireland than the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Of course, the standpoint of the right hon. and learned Gentleman and his friends was not the same as that of the Nationalist Members, but they seemed now to be agreed that Ireland was an oppressed and wronged country. If the landlord class were oppressed, as the right hon. Gentleman averred, so were the tenants. His right hon. and learned Friend had entered that House under the auspices of the First Lord of the Treasury. When the right hon. Gentleman was contesting the Trinity College seat, the First Lord of the Treasury gave him a character as to his experience in Irish matters. It was on July 29, 1892.

*The CHAIRMAN of WAYS and MEANS: How does the hon. Member propose to connect this with the Vote?

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL said that he would connect it with the Vote in a way that would be patent to the meanest understanding. [Laughter.] On the date which he had mentioned the First Lord of the Treasury wrote his right hon. and learned Friend a letter in which he spoke of him as being specially competent to supply information and give advice upon the legal aspects of all Irish questions, and as being well qualified by training and ability to take a prominent part in the House of Commons, and on public platforms when Irish subjects were being discussed. Those were the terms in which the First Lord of the Treasury spoke of his right hon. and learned Friend who now, after five years' experience of the House of Commons had come to the same conclusion—judging from his speech—which the Irish Members on the Opposition side of the House had come to long ago—namely, that the British Parliament was either incompetent or unwilling to do justice to the Irish people. Whilst he agreed with much that the right hon. Gentleman had said he could not subscribe to all that he had said regarding the Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners, for among the 80 officials selected by the Government there was not one who could be regarded as having any special sympathy with the tenants. Without exception all the Sub-Commissioners had been appointed by the present Government, and all the Chief Commissioners, with the one exception of Mr. Murrough O'Brien, had also been appointed by them. All the gentlemen appointed by preceding Governments had been reappointed by the present Ministry with approval of their judicial action. The landlords declared that the reductions of rent pressed hardly upon them. He believed that that was so, and sympathised with them. His right hon. Friend who spoke a few minutes ago was not singular in that respect, but the answer to his complaint was, who had produced that system? ["Hear, hear!"] The English Government had produced it—["hear, hear!"]—and he contended that the Irish landlords would be better off if they joined with their own colleagues than they were in relying on an English Government. [Cheers.] The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University had referred to the land hunger which existed in Ireland. He said that there was a land hunger because of the limited supply of land, and because there was no other outlet for industry in Ireland; but who was responsible for the fact that there were no industries in Ireland? It was the English Government. [Cheers.] But in the misfortunes and vicissitudes which must always accompany movements like the land agitation, the misfortunes that had fallen on the toiling millions of Ireland must not be ignored. No doubt it was very miserable to see the reductions that had to be made in the great households; but he would rather see a reduction in the establishments of 10 country gentlemen than one child in want of a bit of bread. ["Hear, hear!"] He wondered whether the Chief Secretary would maintain during this Debate his uncomfortable position of energetic silence. [Laughter.] The right hon. Gentleman had lately been like a sheep dumb before the shearers. Would he hear his right hon. Friend the Attorney General? He would be glad to hear him because he knew he sympathised with him. He would be also glad to know whether they were to hear anything from their Friend the hon. Member for South Tyrone: or were the Government going to "Gorst" him? [Ministerial cries of "Order!"] He would withdraw that expression if it was unparliamentary. He thanked the House for the kindness with which they had listened to him. He would, in conclusion, impress on his Unionist Friends that all Irishmen had much in common, and if they could only take the country into their own hands, they would soon cease to be bullied and cajoled by an incompetent English Administration. [Cheers.]

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): My right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University has touched in eloquent terms on the misfortunes under which the landlord class in Ireland are suffering at this time. I do not think that from those words anybody on either side of the House will dissent. Undoubtedly the landlord class in Ireland are suffering severely. Their incomes have been very materially reduced during the last 15 or 20 years; they are in a large number of cases heavily burdened with charges on their estates; and in many instances they have been reduced to live on a comparatively small portion of the income they once enjoyed. All that is undoubtedly true. There may be some controversy as to whether these misfortunes have been brought about entirely in consequence of the legislation this House has passed from 1881 upwards; but I should not be in order in discussing the policy of the Land Act of 1881, and the amending Acts that followed it. Still, I think it is only right to remind the House that, while we on this side of the House never approved of the principle of the Act of 1881 in the first instance, yet, on the other hand, there were difficulties in connection with the Irish land question at that time which, no doubt, did call for legislation of some kind or another—["hear, hear!"]—and in the speeches that have been made lately by the landlords and those who represented them at the Convention in Dublin and elsewhere, I must say that I could have wished there had been some reference to the circumstance that the Richmond Commission and other Commissions, consisting to a very considerable extent of landlords, declared that some of the principal evils at that time arose from the excessive price then paid for tenant-right, and from the fact that rents had been too much raised on the tenants. ["Hear, hear!"] It is impossible, in taking a general view of the land legislation of the past 15 years, and in endeavouring to form an estimate as to whether it was justified or not, to leave these considerations entirely out of sight; and I would go further and remind my right hon. Friend that, although the landlords and their representatives attack the policy of the Act and the amending Acts, when those amending Acts were before the House they did not vote against them. They did not vote against the Act of 1887, nor against the Second Reading of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, nor against the Second Reading of the Bill of last year. In these circumstances I think they must admit, as we on this Bench admit and maintain, that whatever objections may be justly raised to the principle of the Act of 1881, that Act, having been once passed into law, it would be unwise and unstatesmanlike to attempt to return to the condition of things that obtained before it was passed. ["Hear, hear!"] Apart from the question of the policy of the Act of 1881, this discussion has mainly turned on the procedure and personnel of the Land Commission. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University made a speech of very great moderation, especially when compared with the speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet, who himself once held the office I now hold. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University, in discussing this question of the Sub-Commissioners, admitted that he was not in a position to say whether the reductions of rent lately made by them were just or not—very different language from that held by my right hon. Friend the Member for Thanet. In this connection I should like to refer to a speech of my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Armagh, delivered in Dublin the other day. This is what he said:—

> "They passed a Land Act, and they wanted to make 40 millions spread to what 80 or 90 millions might have done that they did not get, and they chose Land Commissioners who would whittle down the rents, and then, according to this new principle of statesmanship, which he could not sympathise with, it appeared that, undoubtedly, it was more easy and more cheap to buy a bankrupt landlord than it was to buy a solvent one. So the thing was to make a bankrupt of him first and then buy him up. Now, he asked them was he exaggerating in the least?"

["Hear, hear!" from Colonel SAUNDERSON.] I am sorry to hear my hon. and gallant Friend say "Hear, hear!" because that really amounts to a charge that the Government have deliberately appointed men who might be counted upon to reduce the landlords' rents. I really do think it is unworthy of my hon. and gallant Friend to suspect for one moment that the Government in making these appointments looked to the probability that the men appointed would cut down rents. ["Hear, hear!"] If we were actuated by motives of that kind we should be unworthy of the position we occupy.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): That certainly was not my intention. I simply pointed to the fact that the Government chose Commissioners whose probable action would be to lower rents and make the landlords bankrupt.

MR. T. M. HEALY: They raised them on Lord Annesley's estate last week.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I do not think my hon. and learned Friend's interruption very much alters what I have said. ["Hear, hear!"] We are accused on the other side of having appointed the Commissioners with the deliberate view that they should not reduce rents by an adequate amount; but I will do hon. Members opposite the justice to say that I do not think they believe that. [Mr. MACNEILL: "We do!" and laughter.] Of course, the object of the Government in making the appointments was to secure men who would carry out their duties in an impartial manner under the Act. Let me say one word as to the statements of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. He says that since the Government came into office 80 appointments have been made, that of these only three are Roman Catholics, and that over 70 are landlords or landlords' agents. I have not got the figures, but we have not made anything like 80 appointments. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Then you ought to!"] I think we have appointed something like 24 Sub-Commissioners who have not held the position before, and of these I believe several are Roman Catholics, though I do not know. Religion does not come into these appointments. [A laugh.]

I have told the Member for Louth and others more than once that it is not the object of the Government to prevent Roman Catholics from receiving appointments for which they are qualified. I think in that matter I shall have the support of the Member for Montrose. I believe that, if anything, it is the disposition of the Government to stretch a point in the appointment of Roman Catholics, everything being equal. [An HON. MEMBER: "Never; nonsense!"] I think the Member for Montrose will confirm me in that. That, however, is a matter of comparatively small importance. As to 70 out of the 80 being landlords or land agents, I am quite sure that that proportion is absolutely inaccurate.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then give us your figures and version.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The hon. Member has only to look at the published list of the Sub-Commissioners to see that his statement is without foundation.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I maintain it.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Now, Sir, I pass from that question to the complaint of my right hon. Friend the Member for Dublin University that the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners are not supported by reasons for those decisions. My answer to that is that you may analyze as much as you please and enumerate as much as you please, but ultimately you will have to come to a matter of opinion.

MR. CARSON was understood to say that he had asked to be stated the proportion of the rents to the market value.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The Act of 1881 did away with it.

MR. CARSON: Might I ask my right hon. Friend whether any Sub-Commissioner has laid down what he means by a fair rent?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir, the Act requires him to fix a fair rent, and he is to start from the facts as they are before him. Then there is the statement that the Commissioners are entirely in the hands of the Court valuers. It is for the Commissioners themselves to decide, after hearing the valuers, what a fair rent should be. It is a singular fallacy that, because the valuers have been Sub-Commissioners, therefore they are not to be trusted. As a matter of fact, the valuers are men who have been selected for this special duty from the body of the Sub-Commissioners at large. They are not chosen haphazard, and I do not believe you could get better valuers outside the ranks of the Sub-Commissioners. If you went outside you would have a greater chance of getting valuers who were not so impartial as the Court valuers. ["Hear, hear!"] Now I come to what is, after all, the great point. The complaint is made that these Sub-Commissioners have made reductions which are complained of as unjust and unfair. On the other side, however, it is said that the reductions are not adequate to meet the difficulties of the case. ["Hear, hear!"] There are a great many considerations which have to be borne in mind. We have heard a great deal about the high prices given for tenant-right. Then we hear about the reductions of rent being far greater than was justified by the fall in prices; and some say that the fall in rent should be according to the fall in prices. ["Hear, hear!"] It is very easy to argue from these general considerations, but I am convinced that it is exceedingly difficult from these general considerations to arrive at any clear, satisfactory, and cogent conclusion. But while the tenants appear to be dissatisfied with the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners, the landlords have given their dissatisfaction a practical form, for they have asked for an inquiry into the procedure and practice of the Land Commissioners. That Inquiry the Government have decided to grant. ["Oh, oh!"] The form which the inquiry will take will be a Royal Commission, small in numbers, but to be selected with a view to the impartiality of its members—[ironical Home Rule cheers]—and in some cases their expert knowledge of the value of land. I am not yet in a position to say what the exact terms of reference will be or who will be appointed to serve, but I have, I think, sufficiently indicated the general character of the inquiry. Whether the result of the inquiry will be to justify the expectations that are formed by my hon. Friends on this side is in my judgment very open to question indeed, but, of course, in asking for this Commission they must know perfectly well that it is possible that the conclusions arrived at by the Commission may be adverse to them.

MR. T. H. HEALY: There is no fear of that.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: It is not intended that the principles of the Acts shall be inquired into; those are to be taken for granted. It will be an inquiry into the practice and procedure of the Land Commission and of the Land Courts in fixing fair rents, and into the practice and procedure of the Land Commission in making advances under the Land Purchase Acts. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Will the personnel of the Land Commission be inquired into?] No. The Government did not feel justified in refusing a request made so strongly by a body of men who are undoubtedly, rightly or wrongly, convinced that they are suffering very serious injustice. But there is another reason why in my judgment it is a proper thing to appoint a Commission of inquiry. Charges are now being freely made against the competence and, in some quarters, even as to the honesty, of the Sub-Commissioners. Those charges it is impossible for the Land Commissioners to meet at the present time. They have to remain silent under the accusations which are levelled against them. In my judgment, for the sake of the Land Commissioners alone, it is desirable there should be an inquiry.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Has the Land Commission been consulted?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, the Land Commission has not been consulted in the matter. Let me repeat that we have not decided to appoint this Commission of Inquiry with any preconceived idea as to whether the rents which are now being fixed are too high or too low. We feel that we have not sufficient data on which to form a judgment. We think it is very important that there should be upon this subject some kind of authoritative decision rather than that public opinion should be left to the mercy of assertions founded for the most part upon uninstructed, vague, and general considerations. [Cheers.]

MR. DILLON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will inform us whether it is proposed to stop the fixing of fair rents and to suspend the payment of rents until the Royal Commission reports.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I confess I listened to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman with considerable surprise and with some dismay—["Hear, hear!"]—and I think that the embarrassment—if I may so call it—with which the right hon. Gentleman announced the appointment of this Commission, showed that it is in no very right good will on his part that this concession has been made to the pressure of the Irish landlords. [Cheers.] That pressure began almost immediately after the passing of the right hon. Gentleman's Act of last year; it was pressure that was set in operation in anticipation of anything that was done by the Commissioners or by the Sub-Commissioners. When the Duke of Abercorn brought this proposal forward in another place the Prime Minister dismissed it with a series of objections which those who heard him felt were in his own mind conclusive at the time. What is taking place now is a repetition of what took place, and took place with such mischievous results, in the case of the Land Act of 1881. ["Hear, hear!"] All who sat on the Committee over which I presided in 1894 are aware that witnesses of every kind came before that Committee and gave as one of the reasons for what is an indisputable fact—namely, that the rents fixed in 1882 and 1883 were too high—the deterrent effect exercised on the minds of the Sub-Commissioners, first of all by the appointment of a Committee, and, secondly, by the attitude of Lord Salisbury and others.

MR. CARSON: I do not recollect any such evidence.

COLONEL WARING: I must say I have no recollection of it.

MR. J. MORLEY: The evidence may have been given after those hon. Gentlemen, unfortunately, deserted the Committee.

COLONEL WARING: There was no evidence taken after we left.

MR. J. MORLEY: My statement can be tested by the Blue-book. Besides, the hon. Member for South Tyrone was a Member of the Committee, and I am sure he will not deny what I have said. Now, one very extraordinary reason for the appointment of this Commission has been given; it is that Gentlemen below the gangway opposite and gentlemen in Ireland—landlords—have made extravagant and unjust and partisan accusations as to the action of the Land Commissioners. That was to say, if you want a Commission all you have to do is to make a series of extravagant and unsubstantiated charges, and the Government of the day, in order to clear the officers so charged, will appoint a commission of inquiry. The First Lord of the Treasury used to say, or, at any rate, his policy indicated the belief by him, that the Land Commissioners are judicial, or quasi- or semi-judicial gentlemen. Would he, I wonder, have consented to appoint a Commission in order to meet extravagant and unsubstantiated assertions made by hon. Gentlemen below the gangway on the Opposition side of the House? He would have been the last man in the House to do so. There is another point I must mention. The hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin might say that the Committee over which I presided did not take all the evidence which ought to have been taken—[Mr. CARSON: "Hear, hear!"]—but the Chief Secretary for Ireland brought in a Bill founded avowedly—— Oh, the right hon. Gentleman may shake his head, but it was so. It may have been bad tactics on the part of the Chief Secretary, but as to the fact there is no doubt. In introducing his Bill, the right hon. Gentleman referred again and again to the report of the Committee as constituting the foundation upon which he reared his Bill. He, at all events, appeared to think that there was so much value to be attached to the evidence taken before that Committee and to its Report that he felt legislation was called for, and not a word was said, in the introduction or the conduct of that Bill, to show that the right hon. Gentleman for one moment thought that any reason had been brought forward why the action of the Sub-Commissioners or the Land Commissioners should be subjected to unfavourable criticism. At that time, not nine months ago, it had not entered into the right hon. Gentleman's mind that there was any kind of objection made to the action or equity or fairness of the gentlemen who administered those Acts. The right hon. Gentleman said in the earlier part of his remarks what I entirely subscribe to. He said it was doing him and the Irish Government a great injustice to suppose for a moment that he has appointed one single Sub-Commissioner either because he hoped or thought that he would fix rents high or low. I do not suppose for one moment that such a consideration ever entered into the mind of the right hon. Gentleman; but is he not by appointing this Commission, because suspicions, or more than suspicions, have lodged themselves in the minds of the landlord party, showing that he is himself yielding to the expression of suspicions which, as applied to himself, he indignantly and quite properly repudiates? He says that this Commission is not to inquire into the principles of the Land Act, but into procedure only. What kind of evidence, I want to know, is this Royal Commission going to take which did not come before the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1894, and what kind of men are you going to have? It has been suggested in the public prints, but I dismiss the matter from my mind as entirely unworthy of belief, that this Commission is to be presided over by a Judge, and the name of an able Judge was mentioned; because, say what you like, the object of the Commission can only be one which cannot be friendly to the tenants. [Nationalist cheers.] I do not say the right hon. Gentleman or the Government have in their minds a deliberate intention of any sort of putting pressure on the Land Commission or Sub-Commissioners, but it is perfectly notorious—and the Irish are not so slow-witted as not to be wide awake to the fact—that this Commission is appointed to please the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dublin University and those whom he so ably and powerfully represents—[Nationalist cheers]—a Commission appointed with the expectation in the minds of those who got it appointed that they will find flaws and inequalities and errors in the procedure of the Land Court. To put a Judge at the head of a Commission which, say what you like, is to be a landlord Commission —[Nationalist cheers]—will certainly not be killing Home Rule with kindness. ["Hear, hear!"] I will not say any more than this. You pass a Rent Act in 1887—I do not go further back than that—and another Rent Act in 1896; and then in 1897, before the Act has been eight or nine months in operation, you show so little confidence in your own handiwork that you are going to appoint an important Royal Commission to overhaul the doings of the body to whom you have intrusted the carrying out of your legislation. I have heard the announcement with dismay and deep regret; and I am perfectly sure that the Chief Secretary, when he is in Ireland at all events, knows it is a most fatal error they are making with a view to the good working of his own Act. [Cheers.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not propose to survey the whole Debate that has taken place to-night upon the Land Commission, but one or two words, I think, must be said in answer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not traverse what I should regard as inaccuracies, however important in themselves, which are not relevant to this particular Debate—such an inaccuracy, as I think, as the statement that the Bill of last year was based on the Report of the Committee over which the right hon. Gentleman opposite presided. I do not think that is an accurate description of the Bill, which, though it did contain several of the non-controversial clauses which found a place in the right hon. Gentleman's own Bill, did not resemble that Bill in any of its broader aspects, and certainly did not copy that Bill in many of the objectionable features, as we think, which the right hon. Gentleman proposed to add to the land legislation of Ireland. The immediate discussion before the House is the propriety of the course which the Government have adopted. When the right hon. Gentleman opposite points out that we are dealing with a judicial body, and that inquiries into the action of a judicial body are in themselves rather dangerous remedies, I entirely agree with him. I think the course we have adopted is one which ought to be adopted with reluctance, and only if there is adequate ground shown for it; but observe that, by the very nature of the case, the sort of judicial work which we have thrown upon the Land Commission by the Act of 1881 and successive Acts justifies a procedure which would not be proper if we were dealing with the administration of settled principles of law such as those which the ordinary practice of the Courts in this country administer. I have never concealed from the House that, however great the excuses—and they were great—for the experiment made in 1881, that experiment was in itself a disastrous experiment—[cheers]—foredoomed to failure, or, at all events, to partial failure—and that we attempted to do through the medium of a Court that which no Court could adequately accomplish. Let it not be said it is no longer open to us to make in 1897 such criticisms as were passed in 1881 inasmuch as we ourselves have been responsible for Acts amending the Act of 1881. No such criticism holds good against our policy. The Act of 1881 was passed, rightly or wrongly—wrongly and unfortunately, as I think—and it became the fundamental law governing the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and no practical statesman, I venture to say, would suggest that the system then established could be destroyed except by the gradual extinction of double ownership by the creation of a great system of peasant proprietary. That has been our view consistently for the last 16 years. Holding that view, we have felt it our duty, not merely to pass from time to time Acts intended to facilitate land purchase in Ireland, but also, finding that we had to administer Ireland under the Act of 1881, to make the principles of that Act as tolerable as they could be made and as just to the various parties connected with land in Ireland. That is the position of the land problem as we conceive it. What has happened is precisely what everyone foresaw must happen—namely, that these Land Courts have been subjected, from one side and the other, by an inevitable necessity, to criticism which, if it has had no other effect, has had the effect necessarily of diminishing the authority with which their decisions have been received both in Ireland and in this country. It is a most unfortunate fact; it is a fact which we all deplore, but it is a fact which could have been foreseen, and which was almost inevitable, human nature being what it is. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says, "You are appointing this Commission in the interests of the landlords—[Nationalist cheers]—all those who represent the tenants will complain, and have a right to complain, of the course you are pursuing." The course we are pursuing is as greatly justified by the utterances of the friends of the tenants as it is by the utterances of the friends of the landlords. It is perfectly true that the landlords hold, rightly or wrongly, that the recent reductions in the second statutory term have been excessive. True it is that they have criticised in detail the machinery of the Land Commission, and in particular they have alleged that the system of appeal is one which practically gives, and can give, no confidence to the various suitors who come before the Commission. But if these have been the charges levelled by the landlords against the administration of the Acts, charges equally as strong, and uttered from even more numerous mouths, have been uttered against the Land Commission on behalf of the tenants. In this afternoon's Debate charges against the Land Commission of not reducing rents sufficiently have been explicitly made by, among others, the hon. and learned Member for Louth. I really think it would be better if no suspicion existed as to the action of the Land Court, that no charges of this kind were bandied about from side to side. We have to take facts as they are; and undoubtedly the result of recent events has been that a widespread sense of insecurity as to the decisions of the Sub-Commissioners in the first instance and of the Head Commissioners on appeal has been diffused throughout both the great classes concerned in the administration of the Land Acts. Under these circumstances are we wrong in doing what we can to restore that confidence which, through no fault of ours, has been shaken in Ireland? [Laughter.] I gather from the laughter of the hon. Member for Donegal that he regards with derision that statement of policy on the part of the Government. But let me say that there may be circumstances under which, whatever may be the evils of action, the evils of inaction are still greater—["Hear, hear!"]—and I am convinced that, though it is far better, if you can, to leave the action of any tribunal untouched by public criticism, uninterfered with by outside inquiry, still, if you reach a point when the result of inquiry would be to restore confidence which has been shaken and to bring back a state of things which unfortunately has been disturbed, your only choice, the only choice left open to the Government, is to take such a course and to follow it out to the best of their ability. [Ministerial cheers.] Now, Sir, what says the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the Montrose Burghs? He says:—

> "Will a Commission, if appointed, add anything to the mass of information collected by the Committee of which he was Chairman?"

I am bound to say that I thought this reference of the right hon. Gentleman an unfortunate one—["hear, hear!"]—because he must be well aware that, whether through the fault of the Government, of which he was a member, or to unfortunate accident, this result was obtained—that while that Committee took all the evidence which the tenants desired on their side of the case, the landlords, however rightly or wrongly, thought that the evidence on their side of the case was burked and never taken at all. [Ministerial cheers and cries of "Oh!"] I believe I am not mistaken in an historical fact when I say that the Parliamentary Committee desired to close the evidence taken before it at the very moment when the principal allegations on behalf of the landlords were about to be brought before it. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches]. Even if that be not an accurate statement of fact, though I believe it to be perfectly accurate, it is universally believed by the landlords in Ireland, and that circumstance alone will show how much may still require to be done by a small Commission, and that is the intention of the Government in proposing it. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has by anticipation done his best to destroy the value of the labours of this Commission by expressing his opinion that it is appointed in the interests of the landlords. [Irish cheers.] Well, Sir, it can only be appointed in the interests of the landlords if the landlords have been suffering injustice. I offer no suggestion or opinion on that point at all. I can most honestly and truly say I have formed no opinion—

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then why do you appoint a Commission?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Why appoint a Commission? I propose to appoint a Commission, as I have already endeavoured to explain to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Committee, because partly through his exertions discredit has been thrown upon the labours of the Land Courts; and some investigation of the course they are pursuing is absolutely necessary if that confidence is to be restored. For my own part I can most truly say that while I have heard a great deal both on the side of the landlord and on the side of the tenant with regard to judicial rents, I have never been able—and if I had made up my mind, if I had formed any opinion as to the action of the Commissioners in fixing judicial rents I should not express it; but I can truly say that I have formed no such opinion. On the contrary, the whole question seems to be one of extreme difficulty, and it may be naturally supposed that I have taken my share in appointing this Commission with no preformed opinion as to what the result of its labours is likely to be. I am not sure that if I had been interested in Irish land I should have pressed the Government to appoint it. ["Hear, hear!" from the Nationalists.] That is my own view. But we have been pressed to appoint a Commission, and even those who have not pressed us to do so—even those who like hon. Gentlemen opposite, appear to dislike the idea of a Commission—have themselves, by reiterating their unceasing criticisms upon the decisions of the Land Courts, given us the very strongest argument that can be given for the course we have adopted. Under these circumstances, Sir, I hope the Committee will feel that we really have done our best to make this almost unworkable land system in Ireland work with justice both to the landlords and to the tenants; and that if, after all the legislation in which we have been engaged, we think that an inquiry into the working of that legislation is now necessary, we say that it is necessary not because we have in any sense prejudged the controversy between landlord and tenant, but because now as ever we think it our duty to take every step which may secure justice as between those two great classes. [Ministerial cheers.]

MR. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.) said he thought there would not be in Ireland on any side of politics a second opinion as to the object with which the Commission was appointed. The object was, of course, to put pressure upon the Sub-Commissioners. This Commission had been granted at the request of the Irish landlords, he might almost say, he thought, without exaggeration, that it had been granted in consequence of the threats of the Irish landlords. Therefore, it was preposterous and absurd for the right hon. Gentleman to contend that it was a Commission in the granting of which the Government had equally considered the interests of the tenant farmers and the landlords. It was a sop thrown out to their enraged supporters in Ireland, or to supporters who affected to be enraged. Now, what was the situation? They had got a Land Commission which had been manned from the top to the bottom by a Government which was a Government of the Irish landlords. He believed, as had been already stated by the hon. Member for North Louth, and, if not admitted, not contradicted—that with the exception of one or two individuals, the whole body of Commissioners, including the members of the Head Commission, and the Assistant Commissioners, whose salaries they were now discussing, were appointees of a Government which was a Government by the choice of the Irish landlords. So that the Irish landlords were in this position—that they had had the manning of the Commission, they had had the nominating of the men who were now deciding the rents of the Irish tenants; and not content with that, they must go a step farther; and because owing to the pressure of irresistible facts and circumstances, the Commissioners were giving a certain reduction of rents—what he and his friends believed to be a very insufficient reduction—they must now insist on a Commission which could have no object but to intimidate these Sub-Commissioners with a view to producing an insufficient reduction of rents. Let him refer for a moment to the extraordinary speech delivered by Lord Salisbury in reply to the deputation of landlords. It was, he thought, one of the most extraordinary speeches ever delivered by a responsible Minister of the Crown. Because he took up this amazing position—

> "I don't profess to know whether your demand is a just demand or not, but what I advise you to do is this—if you think you have any claim, agitate;"

they were to agitate and to put pressure upon Ministers by their public agitation. Well, he and his Friends had been accustomed to be denounced in every mood as agitators, as men who were engaged in a disreputable occupation; and now they saw Her Majesty's Prime Minister advising a deputation of dukes and noblemen to allow themselves to be degraded to that same position of public agitators. [Laughter.] What did Lord Salisbury go on to say? He was discussing the merits of various forms of inquiry which might be granted. He first pointed out that a Royal Commission was utterly unsuited to the case. He then went on to say that—

> "there was a Committee of one of the Houses of Parliament after the passing of the Act of 1881, and my impression is that, on the whole, that Inquiry did good, if not so much as was anticipated, but on the whole it was beneficial."

Those were sinister words. Everybody who remembered that time knew that the effect of the Inquiry by the Committee of the House of Lords was an immediate cutting down of the reductions in rent—by intimidating the Sub-Commissioners; and the Prime Minister, with a masterly audacity—he might almost say indecency—deliberately pointed out to the landlords, and advocated to his Friends, the beneficial effect he expected from any Commission which might be appointed by remembering that a Committee of the House of Lords had had some beneficial effect on a former occasion, though not as much as they expected. Now what meaning could be attached to that language except one? What did the beneficial effect of a Commission upon the Irish landlords amount to? They knew that the only effect the landlords would consider beneficial would be the effect of limiting the reductions of rents by the Land Commissioners. ["Hear, hear!"] And Lord Salisbury indicated to the landlords that if they made themselves sufficiently active in agitation, and put enough pressure on the Government, no doubt their will would be carried into effect and their demands be granted. The Irish landlords, he was bound to say, did not long delay to act upon that advice. They summoned a large meeting at Dublin, which was held on the 13th of April last. He would refer for a single moment only to the character of that meeting. The character of the speeches delivered at the meeting of landlords in Dublin on April 30 removed all doubt as to the reasons for appointing this Commission. The Duke of Abercorn, at that meeting, quoted Lord Salisbury's words:—

> "In the days in which we live the class that does not complain is the class that will go to the wall," and he said:—

> "This means agitation. Now, agitation is a most useful method of bringing questions before the public mind. . . . . If you look back upon the history of this country you will see the every great reform has been obtained by agitation."

Here, then, they had the deplorable spectacle of a Duke advising his friends in Ireland to betake themselves to the much-abused vocation of agitators. He was astonished that the Chief Secretary had not come to the House prepared to give more particulars as to the character and antecedents of the men whom he had appointed as Commissioners.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I beg pardon. All I was unable to say was that there were so many landlords among them, so many agents, and so many tenants.

MR. DILLON thought that the right hon. Gentleman ought to have been ready to give more particulars, seeing that he must have known that the character of his appointments would be challenged. There were six members of the Chief Court of the Land Commission—because Judge Ross was practically a member—and five of them were nominees of the Unionist Government. Bearing in mind their antecedents and connections, it was impossible not to see that they must sympathise with the landlords. The right hon. and learned Member for Trinity College had drawn a very truthful picture of the farcical state of affairs in this Court when questions of land value were being considered. The Court was presided over by a most estimable Judge, who was an excellent lawyer, but who knew nothing about the value of land. Another member of the Court was Mr. Fitzgerald, who, according to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, knew nothing about land; and a third was Mr. Wrench, who was skilled in the rearing of hackney horses, and who, at one time, was one of the best known agents for the landlords in the North of Ireland. The right hon. and learned Member, however, had omitted to mention one member of the Court—namely, Mr. O'Brien. It was a very curious circumstance that Mr. O'Brien, who knew more about the value of land than, perhaps, any man in Ireland, and who was the only member of the Court appointed by a Liberal Government, was nearly always overruled. He was, in fact, almost boycotted, and the business of the Land Court was left practically to the Unionist nominees. Irish Unionists who denounced the Government ought to remember that it was the Government of their choice; they had subscribed their money to put it in power, and as long as the landlord party in Ireland helped to keep this Government in power by supporting it, they could not say with any show of reason that the appointments to the Land Commission were made in the interests of the tenants. The appointments to the Commission had not been made in the interests of the tenants. Almost to a man the officials were the enemies of the tenants. The Chief Secretary had appealed to them not to impute unworthy motives to him. He did not do so, for he did not believe that the right hon. Gentleman had appointed a single Commissioner with a view to having the rents raised. But the right hon. Gentleman had been obliged to make selections among thousands of men of whose characters, views, and dispositions he knew nothing, and what means had he to decide which of these men were fit for the appointments? Of course, he had to rely on those who recommended the selected candidates, and the officials and people with whom he was in communication had influenced him to lean towards the landlord side in making those appointments. That was inevitable, having regard to the atmosphere in which the right hon. Gentleman lived. He had himself made independent inquiries into the antecedents and character of the gentlemen who had been appointed Sub-Commissioners, and he asserted that, out of 73 lay Sub-Commissioners, 53 were, or had been in one capacity or another, closely connected with the landlord class, and he believed that many among the rest could be described in the same way. He was certain that he was well within the mark in saying that four-fifths of the lay Sub-Commissioners were either landlords, the agents of landlords—which was worse—or gentlemen who had distinguished themselves by canvassing and spouting in the Unionist cause, and denouncing the dishonesty of Irish tenants. The right hon. Gentleman had called attention to the number of farmers who, he said, had been appointed as Land Commissioners. This description of "farmer" was, however, not exhaustive in many cases. Third on the list, for example, was a gentleman who was described as "a tenant," but this gentleman had been a leading land agent and valuer for the landlords in the North of Ireland before his appointment. He had taken the greatest pains to find out the facts, and he did not believe it was possible for the Chief Secretary to contradict his statement that four-fifths of the Commissioners were either landlords or supported by the landlords in their claims to be appointed. The right hon. Gentleman was asked whether the Commission would investigate and report upon the personnel of the Land Commission, but they were to report upon exactly what the landlords wanted, and upon nothing else. The right hon. Member for Trinity College drew a touching picture of the sufferings, and what he described to be the feelings of despair, of the Irish landlords. He had no doubt there was a great deal of truth in that moving and heart-rending picture, but the right hon. Gentleman had touched very little on the other side, which was not the sufferings of a few individual families but of hundreds and thousands of the industrious poor in Ireland. He did not desire to inflict hardships in a spirit of vengeance upon the landlords, and still less on unfortunate bodies. Three or four years ago when the question of a Roman Catholic University for Ireland was discussed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Trinity College said that if the Irish people were only allowed to settle the question they would do so to the satisfaction of all parties. [Cheers.] He had thought that was the dawning of a similar view on the part of the right hon. Gentleman on the land question. In 1885, in order to inaugurate a new and happier era for Ireland, they offered terms to the Irish landlords which they would never again get—["hear, hear!"]—and those terms were thrust back and refused—[cheers]—as hon. Gentlemen opposite thought they could best serve the interest of their class by tying themselves to an alien Government which they believed would be loyal to the Unionist garrison. They were now reaping the harvest of what they had sown, and perhaps the time would come yet when they would find their countrymen willing, and only too willing, to bury in oblivion the bitter and miserable past, and that they would obtain better terms from them than from any English Government. [Cheers.] He confessed he listened with great pleasure to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Trinity College adopting their views that night, and pointing out the causes which had brought about the rackrenting and misery of the tenants in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] It was due, he said, to the lack of other occupations; and why was it that the people were driven to compete with each other to the point of absolute starvation and nakedness? It was because the class to which the right hon. Gentleman belonged had in the past forgotten their duties to their people. [Cheers.] He hoped the speech they had listened to that night was some indication of the dawning of a better day amongst the Irish Unionists [Cheers.] But with reference to the appointment of this Commission by which Ireland would be thrown into turmoil, and they would be afforded the spectacle of noble Dukes engaged in agitation—that was a game two could play at, and he had no doubt that the Chief Secretary by this Commission would let loose a considerable flood of agitation in Ireland. The Commission would be regarded by the tenant farmers of Ireland as a deliberate attempt to intimidate the Land Commissioners. Probably the first effect of the appointment of the Commission would be to lessen the reductions. That was the intention.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: We have stated in explicit terms that this Commission is not appointed because we have any opinion as to the justice or injustice of the decisions.

MR. DILLON: Then it comes to this, that any body of men in Ireland have only to make spurious charges against a court of law, and instantly they are to have a Royal Commission. [Irish cheers.] There was no pretence or excuse for this inquiry; on the contrary, the Leader of the House and the Chief Secretary had been very cautious in their language, suggesting that it was most undesirable. However, as the landlords had kicked up a row the right hon. Gentleman intimated that they had no choice in the matter. Were they going to allow the levying and the payment of rent when nobody knew what might be the result of this Commission? They were entitled to recall the remarks of Ministers last year about the finality of their land legislation. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Who said that?"] It was declared on the other side that there was to be no more land legislation so long as this Parliament sat.

MR. CARSON: Who believed it?

MR. DILLON said that he did not believe it, but Ministers said it, and they had a right to enjoy the speedy fulfilment of their promises. He should conclude by strongly advising the tenants to put into practice, with the least possible delay, the advice which Lord Salisbury gave to the landlords—["Hear, hear!"]—namely, that "in these days" classes which did not agitate would go to the wall, and he would further remind the tenants that, so far as that House went, they had nothing to expect, according to the declarations of two Ministers, from this Commission beyond an attempt to destroy the Act of 1881. [Cheers.]

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.) said, if anyone required proof as to the capacity of the Land Commissioners exercising a just decision in the matter of rent, he thought the proof came from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, and the hon. Member who had just sat down. Both of these Gentlemen said that the result of appointing a Commission of Inquiry would be to influence the Sub-Commissioners in fixing rents in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose, on a former occasion, pointed out that the Sub-Commissioners were so affected in Ireland by the appointment of a Commission, that they gave unfair decisions. Now if the appointment of a Commission had this effect upon the minds of the Sub-Commissioners in Ireland, was there not good reason why the landlords, who suffered from their unfair decisions, should have some qualms? He occupied on this question a peculiar position. He was one of the few landlords who supported the passing of the Land Bill of '70, which was the foundation of all subsequent Land Acts. He never could see then, nor did he believe anyone could at that time, nor in 1881, that the passing of a Land Act meant, not fixing fair rents, but sweeping away the whole landlord class in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] If Mr. Gladstone had got up and said that the Act of 1881 was not an Act for fixing fair rents, but for simply lowering rents, no one on that side of the House would have been found to support it. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member then quoted from the Return showing that so far as, for example, Downpatrick was concerned, the reductions in the rent were out of all proportion to previous reductions, and the reductions in the price of produce. In fact rent was reduced now, when the price of produce was going up, and when it was higher than it was during previous periods of reductions. The reductions of 1887-8-9 had changed from 11 per cent. to 31 per cent. [An hon. Member "Quite right!"] Some rents which were reduced a few years ago by 5 per cent. were now reduced by 28 per cent.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: Is the hon. and gallant Member aware that the rents in 1881, 1882, and 1883 were fixed on a wrong principle?

Colonel SAUNDERSON: That I think proves the justice of our demands for inquiry. The Act of 1881 required the Commissioners to fix a fair rent, but finding inspection too laborious a task, they went by the rule of thumb. He would mention one case which illustrated the sort of way in which rents were reduced in Ireland. Some seven years ago the rent of a farm on Mr. Trollope's estates was to be fixed. Concerning the case, the gentleman wrote:—

> "Some years ago the County Court Judge was applied to to fix a fair rent, and as the case was small, I allowed it to remain in the County Court. A few days previous to the day of hearing, at Phillipstown Quarter Sessions, I happened to be on the estate with Mr. Lennan making a valuation, and as we were going home in the evening—a very wet evening—we met the County Court valuer, blind drunk and staggering along, about a mile from the farm he was going to value. He was then too drunk to go any further, and we got him up upon a car, and sent him home. The following Saturday, when the case was called at Phillipstown, County Court Judge Fitzgerald, now Commissioner Fitzgerald, read a letter from the County Court valuer saying he could not value the farm, as it was all under water. I pointed out to the County Court Judge this was a mistake, as the farm was on the top of a hill. The result was, the case was adjourned till the following Tuesday, and the Judge said he would direct his valuer to value the farm on Monday, so as to be ready to fix the rent on Tuesday. I directed my bailiff to wait on Monday to see the valuer valued the proper farm. As I was on my way to Claremorris I met him, and he reported that the Court valuer had not been on the land. You may imagine my surprise on hearing this valuer read out in open Court a most minute valuation of this farm he had never seen, and was never within a mile of in his life except once, and was then so drunk that he could not walk. And yet the County Court Judge fixed the rent of the farm, and reduced our rent on the valuation made by this drunken man, who had never seen the farm in his life."

Mr. T. M. HEALY: That is 10 years ago. How is it we have not heard of it before?

Colonel SAUNDERSON said it was seven years ago; the Statute of Limitation had not quite run out yet. He did not say that all valuers were drunkards—far from it. He did not accuse the Commissioners of dishonesty, but he maintained they were acting on some principle with which he was not acquainted, but wanted to be. There was a revolution proceeding in Ireland. If such a state of things existed in Armenia hon. Members opposite would be found asking questions and moving the Adjournment of the House, pointing out the monstrous iniquity of things, and demanding the instant interference of the British Government. But Irish landlords might be plundered, and they sat still. The Irish landlords were called the English garrison, and they were proud to be known by that title. The hon. Member for East Mayo said, "Are you not sorry you refused what we offered you?" In the name of the class he belonged to, he said "No," and if the offer were made to them again they would refuse it. They believed that their loyalty was worth more than a few years' purchase. Bad as their position was now, he did not believe it would be improved if Home Rule were established; indeed the hon. Member for East Mayo had said with Home Rule they would make short work of the Irish landlords. The work now was not short; it went on in jumps of 15 years, but one thing was certain, that if the rents in Ireland were dealt with in the future as they had been dealt with in the past, a man would not have to live to a very great age to see the whole class of landlords swept away. He regretted the speech he made in Dublin. If he did say, as he possibly did, that the right hon. Gentleman was actuated by sinister motives towards Irish landlords he withdrew his words, though they would apply to the policy the right hon. Gentleman's Government pursued. He could not believe that the prosperity, peace and tranquillity of Ireland was to be founded upon an act of gross injustice. If they destroyed his right to property, what right would the men who came in to-morrow have to his? He believed that the outcome of the new Inquiry would be that the minds of the people would be opened to what the meaning of property and the rights of property were. If it were decided that, for State purposes, the landlord class should be swept away, he trusted the Government would, as honest men, see that the process was not accomplished at the expense of the landlords themselves.

Mr. T. M. HEALY said that the case which the hon. and gallant Member had just mentioned must have occurred in 1887. [Colonel SAUNDERSON; "In 1888!"] The landlord apparently allowed the rent to be fixed without cross-examining the valuer, or without appeal. [Colonel SAUNDERSON: "Do they ever cross-examine the valuer?"] Why did not the landlord complain in Court of the state of the facts? If the valuer got drunk was that not as bad for the tenant as for the landlord? What was the name of the valuer? He presumed if they insisted upon hearing his name they would be told he was dead. Now, he had a few questions to ask in respect to the very grave statement they had just heard from the Chief Secretary. He believed that the proper way to have met that statement was by moving to report Progress, because he conceived that they ought not to go on with the Debate upon the Land Commission Vote until they knew the terms of reference to the new Commission and until they knew who were to form the Commission. He desired to know now, however, whether it was intended that past or only future rents should be affected. Of one thing this House had a horror, and that was of touching anything which was sub judice. But the whole rental of Ireland was sub judice at this moment. This question of rent was at the bottom not only of English rule but of justice, and if this Commission found the rents were too high they would have had an admission that for 15 years they had been converting tenants into caretakers, and making present tenancies into future tenancies on a basis of injustice. Since 1887 they had converted 40,000 present tenancies into future tenancies by way of evictions. Were these 40,000 cases to be inquired into by the Commission, and were they going to ask upon what principles the fair rents were decided, which afterwards led to 40,000 evictions, or were those cases to go un-discussed and un-ransacked, and what the Commission was to go on were to be the cases of the future? And if they were going to deal with future rents, did not they arrest the stream of applications, and did not they paralyse the very fountain of justice itself? He would tell the Committee the genesis of this Royal Commission. The Lord Lieutenant, the representative of Her Majesty, called on the Land Commission last week for a return of the per centage of judicial rents, and horror was expressed by him at the result of the figures. That return was presented to the Cabinet this week —and it was upon the return, irregularly obtained by the Viceroy from a judicial body and irregularly presented by the representative of the Queen, to the Cabinet, that this Royal Commission had been granted. He knew it would be said that it was granted because he had stated earlier in the evening, that the tenants were dissatisfied with the reductions they were getting, but the real genesis of the Commissioners was that which he had just stated. What was the position of these unfortunate Sub-Commissioners? There were 73 laymen, and only 30 of them had permanent jobs. The other 43 held their office till next December, and these 43 trembling wretches were to fix rents in Munster, Leinster, and Connaught with a Judge of the High Court watching their operations. Who was that Judge to be? He could not be an Englishman, because the Party opposite had denounced Mr. Justice Mathew, and had declared that it was an irregularity and an impropriety for an English Judge to go over to Ireland, even on a mission of appeasement, to inquire into the thorny subject of evictions in Ireland. Consequently it could not be an English Judge. It could not be an Irish Judge, because every Irish Judge who had sat on the Bench had denounced their Land Acts. If it was not an Irish Judge, who was it going to be?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: It will not be either an English or an Irish Judge.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then it must be a Scotch Judge.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, nor a Scotch Judge.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Then who is it?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman, but it was, I think, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose who said it was to be an English Judge. I would only say that the right hon. Gentleman has not been taken into the confidence of Her Majesty's Government in this matter.

MR. T. M. HEALY said the House of Commons had a right to be taken into the confidence of the Government—[cheers]—and the Government had no right to make this statement until they were prepared with the names of the Commissioners and the terms of reference. This was the 14th of May, and tomorrow the notice of this Royal Commission would go tingling to the veins of every temporary Sub-Commissioner in Ireland. To-morrow rent reductions would drop to zero. Let any man reckon the percentages that had been given up to the 15th of May, and then let him compare the percentages of reductions that would be given afterwards, and he would venture to say he would discover that reductions would fall 15 per cent. from this day forward. It was four months since the Government announced that they would appoint a Royal Commission to reverse the findings of another Royal Commission with which they were dissatisfied, and Her Majesty's Government had not yet been able to make up their minds as to who were the gentlemen who were to upset the verdict of Lord Farrer, Lord Welby, and other Treasury experts. They were now to have another period of incubation. The Government were wallowing in the mire of landlordism. Their Cabinet was a landlord Cabinet; their Executive was a landlord Executive. They were available to every landlord influence. He did not say they were not striving to do their best. He had always maintained that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was, according to his belief and his lights, honestly endeavouring, as he believed, to steer an even keel as between both parties, but he was plunged into a morass of landlordism, and if it had taken four months to get, and they had not yet got, a Commission for a subject upon which the Treasury had all the facts, how long would it take to get a sufficient number of impartial experts to inquire into the fairness of the fair rents on 350,000 Irish holdings? An instant declaration should be made on the point of what were the rents that were to be inquired into—past rents or future rents. They would, at all events, do something to prevent that feeling of consternation and alarm which would spread throughout every province in Ireland if they were to announce that it would only be as to rent fixed up to this date. Let the Sub-Commissioners, the Chief Commissioners, the landlords, and the tenants know that it would only be as to transactions decided and closed that this inquiry would take place. He could conceive no Court so destitute of self-respect as to go on fixing rents upon holdings when every act they did would be watched by jealous eyes, and when every investigation they made would be subsequently challenged, not in a court of law or of justice, but before a tribunal which had not even the power to call witnesses or administer an oath. The tenants boycotted the Bessborough Commission, and he presumed they would refuse to give evidence before the forthcoming Royal Commission. They would therefore be at the mercy of the landlords, who would be bringing forward their unsifted grievances of seven years ago—or they would have what Mr. Morley's Select Committee had in 1894, they would have to depend, as he depended, upon evidence of officials. If they had official witnesses, it would be only the Land Commissioners white-washing themselves, for it would not be presumed that they would come forward to give themselves a bad character. It appeared to him, therefore, that this proposal had every possible vice. It assailed the very foundations of law; it was an attack upon order. They were told that the British Government was a continuity. It was no longer a continuity; for while a series of statutes had been passed—one by the Liberals, five by the Party now in office, the Government of law and order now propose to indict, not only the framers of the statute, but their administrators. He had intended to say only one word more. He would give the House an instance of what went on, so as to show how far there was any prejudice in the tenants' favour in the action of the Land Courts. An hon. and gallant Member had given them the case of the Jolly estate ten years ago. He would give them the case of the Copeley estate, in the county of Wexford, two months ago. The Copeley estate was an estate under Judge Wallis's Court. The Receiver was instructed to resist the fixing of fair rents on the estate, and there was a standard rule in the Land Judges' Court not to allow any fair rents to be fixed by a County Court Judge, and to transfer them to the Sub-Commission, so that the permanent judges of the land had not the confidence, apparently, of the land judges. The Copeley tenants went into Court, and three Sub-Commissioners were sent down to hear their cases. They gave reductions varying he thought, from about 30 to 40 per cent., he spoke under correction as to the amount. The landlord appealed. What happened? Every man of the Sub-Commissioners was removed from the county of Wexford, and the two lay men were sent to the Botany Bay of the Land Commission, Belmullet in the county of Mayo. Both these Sub-Commissioners, Mr. Dillon and Mr. O'Kelly, were men of the greatest moderation. Mr. O'Kelly he knew to be a landlord of the county of Roscommon and Mr. Dillon, he was told, was from the same place, and he presumed was a landlord also. What happened when these two gentlemen had given their decisions; the Land Commissioners sent down one man to review them—the weakest man, the most landlord man they could get, and he raised the rents from 10 to 15 per cent., and at the present moment there was only one of the Sub-Commissioners operating in Wexford, the other two having for their sins been chased to county Mayo [Laughter.] Now was that the way to treat judicial gentlemen? One would suppose that men who had gained knowledge of a county would be allowed to remain in it. These were not allowed to remain, and simply because of their decisions in the Copeley estate cases they were sent 200 miles off to the most inhospitable and the most unpleasant part of Ireland the Commissioners could exile them to. The Chief Commissioners who managed all these things were both members of the Kildare Street Club—a club consisting of landlords and land agents. So that it was by Kildare Street they were governed, and not as they thought, by the Castle. There was not a land case that was settled in Ireland that was not discussed in that club. And what was more, he said that remonstrances issuing from it—and sometimes personally—were made to the judicial members who belonged to the club. It was monstrous that judicial officers should belong to this Kildare Street Club. Would they be allowed to be members of the National League? [Nationalist cheers.] And if not, why should they be allowed to belong to the chief landlord organisation in the country? When they heard appeals made by a skilful advocate, no doubt great sympathy was aroused for poor ladies who had lost a margin of rent. But what about the poor widow of the Irish tenant? [Nationalist cheers.] What about the two millions who had perished under their eyes of famine? Did it draw tears from that House? [Cheers.] Since 1887 forty thousand present tenancies had been converted into future tenancies. Was there any weeping and wailing over that? Let them go down to Queenstown Quay if they wanted to have their hearts wrung by the sight of miserable people going off from the land which denied them food and shelter. And they were asked to weep over the sufferings of gentlemen who were distressed because they could not have a little more to spend at Monte Carlo. [Nationalist cheers.] As to the religion of the Commissioners, he had gone over their names and he could state accurately what the result was by their place of education. As far as he could make out, out of the 73 men there were only ten Catholics. About one-half of these were appointed by previous Governments; but as far as he could make out the appointments of the right hon. Gentleman he could give him just half-a-dozen Catholics and no more.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR said that of course there was no official information, but he understood that among those appointed before he took office there were six Roman Catholics, and of the 19 new men appointed by himself five were Roman Catholics.

MR. T. M. HEALY: It came to this, that in a population which was mainly Catholic they were dealing with a matter that went to the very lives of the people by a body of which four-fifths were Protestants. What was it that gave a Protestant a knowledge of land? Was it a belief in the Thirty-Nine Articles? [Loud laughter.] Did a man's belief in the infallibility of the Pope render him incapable of judging the value of land? [Laughter.] They were told there were no more Catholics appointed because there were no Catholics suitable. They were not educated enough; and yet they were denied the advantages of university education. They could not have superior education because they were Catholics; and because they were Catholics they could not be Land Commissioners. And here was a fresh Commission to be appointed. Would there be any Catholics on it? Would it be three-fourths Protestant too? He was quite sure the right hon. Gentleman cared no more about religion than himself. [Laughter.] He meant to say he did not mind the creed of any man. But how did it come about that whenever he had to make appointments, three-fourths of them always belonged to the religion of the ascendant Party? If men were appointed who were drawn from a particular class, he maintained that they would sympathise with the people of their own religion. The proof was to be found in this fact—that the Protestant tenant farmers of the north had received larger abatements than the Papists of the south. It was a remarkable fact that the First Lord of the Treasury warned the landlords not to be too hopeful as to the result of this Commission. Did this circumstance not show that the Government themselves had no faith in their own specific, that they regarded it with anxiety, and that they were undermining the foundations of law and order? In this business there was really no foothold for the foot of common sense, and he believed that the Government had taken a fatal course. They had spread uneasiness and dismay from one corner of Ireland to the other, and if the Land Commissioners had any self-respect they would decline to go on fixing rents until this attack upon them had in some way been settled. It was amazing that the Chief Secretary should have stated that the Land Commission ought to welcome this new Commission, when he had neither consulted them as to the matter, the mode, nor the principle of its appointment.

After the usual interval MR. GRANT LAWSON took the Chair.

MR. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said that the announcement made by Her Majesty's Government would be received with the greatest dismay all over Ireland. They could not forget the effect of the action of the House of Lords in 1882 and 1883, when a Committee was appointed by them nominally to inquire into the working of the Land Act, but really to overawe the Commissioners in the task of fixing fair rents. That action was responsible for much of the dissatisfaction and trouble which had since been experienced in Ireland. The second statutory term had just begun to run. In January 72 cases were heard all over Ireland, 63 being in Ulster. The aggregate rent in those cases was £1,430, and the Sub-Commissioners had reduced it for the second statutory term to £1,038. The landlords had taken alarm at this; they had held meetings; they had sent deputations to the Prime Minister with the result that the Government had that night made a startling announcement; but he was confident that when all was said and done, the landlords who had set this matter in motion would not be the most pleased. The Nationalist Members had listened with great interest and not without sympathy to the speech of the right hon. Member for Dublin University. He was surprised it did not strike the right hon. Gentleman that his speech was an indictment of the inevitable. The right hon. Gentleman might as well have tried to indict the Free Trade policy of the country, or foreign competition—nay, he might as well have indicted the unfavourable climatic conditions of the country. The Nationalist Members had much sympathy for the landlords. No one could view with equanimity the spectacle of a class—no matter who they were —reduced to straitened circumstances. But they must not think alone of the landlords. The three millions of the Irish people who were engaged in agriculture were also entitled to the consideration of the House. He asserted that if there had been no land legislation whatever, the fall in prices, the increased foreign competition, the unfavourable climatic conditions of Ireland would have justified far larger reductions in rents than the reductions which had been given in Ireland after a long and sometimes bloody agrarian struggle. Hon. Gentlemen opposite seemed to forget that there were piles of Blue-books and carefully prepared statistics which showed that after all that had happened in Ireland the average reduction in rent up to last year did not exceed 21·5 per cent. all over the country. Much had been made on either side of the high prices which had been given for tenant-right in Ireland. But he was inclined to think that in many cases auctioneers and brokers, to show what clever men they were, quoted the prices at larger figures than had actually been realised by the tenants. It was to be observed that the landlords were very reticent in regard to those cases of sales of tenant-right. The counties were mentioned, but not the names of the parties or any other particulars. He asserted that the average price paid at the present moment for farms did not exceed eight years' purchase of the tenant-right. Mr. Justice Madden, a former Attorney General for Ireland, had declared that the tenant had at least half the property in a holding; and, therefore, eight years' purchase was not an extravagant figure for the tenant-right. It must be remembered also that that right included not only the possession of the land, but the buildings—the dwelling-house and out-offices — which were entirely the property of the tenants in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. They were face to face with the fact that owing to the scarcity of manufactures, agriculture was the great industry of Ireland, and two-thirds of the people depended upon it; and what they had to consider was—were the people of Ireland to be maintained in something like decent comfort on the soil of Ireland, or was the pauperism of the country to continue growing, or the stream of emigration from the country to go on for all time? It would be remembered that in the discussion on the Land Acts last year the representatives of the tenant farmers—not the agitators alone but the Ulster Members—asserted that the judicial rents were not fairly fixed. The question of improvements was not defined with sufficient clearness, and the question of how to arrive at a fair value, taking into account the tenant's interest, was not properly described. The Act of last year might practically never have been placed on the statute book. They had implored the Government to shorten the judicial term in order that tenant farmers with rack rents might be able to come into Court and have their cases heard. The pressure which had been brought to bear on the Government was of a patent and obvious character. The great danger was that it would be impossible for the Sub-Commissioners to consider the fixing of a fair rent with unprejudiced and fearless minds. The tenants were coming to the Court very quickly, and would be coming more and more rapidly. In 1891 they had protested against the salaries and expenses of the Land Commission being put on the Consolidated Fund. It was then argued that the functions of the Commission were of a judicial character, and that they should be put in as independent a position as the Judges of the Superior Court. They on that side did not acquiesce in that argument at that time, although there was much in it. But the Courts of the Sub-Commissioners were retained on these Votes, and it must be remembered that these men were only employed temporarily. As representing the tenant farmers of the country and the working population, who, more than any landlords, Dukes, or noble Lords constituted the people of Ireland, the Nationalist Members protested against the appointment of this Royal Commission as an act of cowardice on the part of the Government. The Government had hearkened to the clamour of a few noble Dukes and Lords, but the proposal would be received throughout Ireland with dismay and indignation. He felt that they should do something to mark their sense of the conduct of the Government, and he therefore moved "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

Mr. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.) supported the Motion. He thought the action of the Government in this matter, having regard to the pledges which they gave to their constituents at the General Election, put them in a very tight place. He presumed they would not hear anything from the hon. Member for South Tyrone on this subject, although they would be very glad to hear whether he approved of this change of front on the part of the Government. The hon. Member, having claimed in interviews given to the Press that the Act of last year was mainly passed through his pressure, as a final settlement of the land question, had within ten months of that apparently consented to the appointment of a Commission which undermined not only the Act of last year, but every principle contained in the previous legislation on this question.

*The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Grant Lawson) requested the hon. Member to keep to the exact Motion before the Committee.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL said the statement which had been made would certainly, he thought, create the most intense dissatisfaction throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. The people had been endeavouring to give the Government the fair trial which was asked for by the Chief Secretary when he came into office. The right hon. Gentleman could not complain of there having been any very vigorous agitation in Ireland, although, for his part, he very much regretted that there had not been one—[Irish cheers]—as the action of the Government showed them that the only way in which they could get attention paid to their wants was by maintaining a vigorous agitation. This matter affected the whole of the people of Ireland, because their main industry was agriculture. He hoped the people of Ireland would show the right hon. Gentleman that he had over-estimated the power of his Government.

Mr. DAVID SHEEHY (Galway, S.) said the Committee were asked to pay Commissioners whose work might be knocked to pieces by the proposed Royal Commission. The money would, under such circumstances, be wasted. He hoped Progress would be reported that they might know where they were. He suggested that the Vote should be withdrawn and payment of the Commissioners suspended until after the Commissioners had reported. It was indefinite as to who the Commissioners would be, and what they were to inquire into.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR said the Government could not consent to Progress being reported or treat the Motion seriously.

Mr. DILLON appealed to the Government to postpone the Vote until the Royal Commission had reported. It was only a reasonable request that the Vote should be withdrawn for the present until they knew what the terms of the reference to the new Royal Commission were to be and they knew something of the personnel of the Royal Commission. [Nationalist cheers.] The Government were about to take a far-reaching and momentous step. If the Vote were taken that night they would have no further opportunity during the Session of discussing the administration of the Land Commission. Irish Members should have an opportunity of consulting their constituents and the public opinion of Ireland as to the personnel of the Commission. The whole situation had been revolutionised by the announcement of the Government. He hoped the Vote would be withdrawn and put down at a later date as soon as the Government had given some information as to the terms of reference and the composition of the Land Commission, and then the Land Commission Vote might be discussed in the light of the new situation.

Sir THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.) said he was not prepared to vote for the Motion, but there was a good deal to be said for it. ["Hear, hear!"] The Committee had been taken rather by surprise. If on a future evening the general principle could be discussed on the Vote an acrimonious discussion that night might be averted.

Mr. M. HEALY said the Nationalist Members had come wholly unprepared for the announcement of the Government, and it was only fair that they should have time to consider it.

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR reminded the hon. Member that only a limited number of nights could be devoted to Supply. If the hon. Gentleman was unable to continue the discussion that night he would point out to him that there would be another opportunity for discussing the appointment of the Commission on the Vote for the Chief Secretary's salary. The hon. Member should reserve his remarks for that occasion, and not stand in the way of hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House who desired to continue the Debate. Since he addressed the Committee only one Member on the Government side had spoken, although four or five were anxious to make some observations.

Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes, 64; Noes, 119.—(Division List, No. 209).

MR J. A. RENTOUL (Down, E.) observed that the Debate had been devoted to two branches—one being an attack upon the personnel of the Land Commission in Ireland, and the other an attack upon the new Commission that was to be appointed. There appeared to be a perfect unanimity between Nationalists opposite and Irish landlords on the Government side of the House with regard to the attack on the recent appointments to the Land Commission; but when they came to the new Commission the action of the Government was defended by hon. Members on their own side and attacked by Nationalist Members on the other. With regard to the appointments that had been made to the Land Commission by the present Chief Secretary, he did not join either with the Nationalists on the other side or the landlords on his own side in their attacks on those appointments, and he was bound to say that no selections by a Government Department had given him so much confidence in the manner in which public appointments were made. There was, he knew, a very prevalent notion that in connection with public appointments "Kissing goes by favour," and that a great number of appointments were made on personal grounds. It had been suggested that evening that the fact that the Chief Secretary was not personally acquainted with the candidates for the Land Commission was a proof of his unfitness to make the appointments. In his opinion that fact constituted the right hon. Member's fitness for the task. His fitness to discharge it lay in the fact that he was not personally acquainted with the candidates. One official only, namely, the Lord Chancellor, was always supposed to appoint officials on his own personal knowledge of their qualifications, while, with that exception, the theory was that the head of a Department ought to appoint on information brought before him, just as a judge and jury were supposed to give their decisions, not in matters within their own knowledge, but upon the evidence adduced in Court. The Home Secretary, for example, who appointed the Metropolitan magistrates did not claim to have any personal knowledge of fitness of candidates, but made appointments upon information supplied to him, and it was the general opinion of the legal profession that no better legal appointments were made. Then the Chief Secretary, not being an Irishman and not having lived in Ireland, had manifestly to make his appointments upon testimony laid before him. Having been anxious himself to secure the appointment of certain candidates for the position of Assistant Sub-Commissioner he had tried to find out how he could effect his object, and upon inquiry in various quarters closely connected with the Government he discovered that these appointments were to be made absolutely impartially upon testimony laid before the Chief Secretary—[A NATIONALIST MEMBER: "By whom?"]—and that no personal influence of any sort was to be allowed to bias his decision. At least 20 gentlemen went to him asking for his influence in their favour as candidates and he replied to every one of them, saying that neither his recommendation nor that of anyone else would be of the slightest value, except as one testimonial among others. Merit alone, he told them, would, he believed, be the test of any candidate's fitness. The testimonials of a large number of the candidates had come under his own notice, and he found that every one of those candidates had strong testimonials from landlords. How then the landlords could attack the appointments he did not understand. He challenged hon. Members to point to a single candidate who had no support from the landlords. [Nationalist cheers.] But, on the other hand, all the testimonials which he saw also contained recommendations from tenant farmers and even Roman Catholic Nationalist farmers, and from parish priests or Catholic curates. [A NATIONALIST MEMBER: "How did you come to see these testimonials?"] Several candidates who asked for his support sent him the testimonials of other gentlemen in order that he might see how superior the qualifications of his correspondents were to those of their rivals. [Laughter.] He judged from what he knew of the testimonials of these gentlemen that were before the Chief Secretary. Every single bundle of them contained testimony from both sides. The hon. Member for East Mayo was less fortunate in his illustrations than in his eloquence; in fact, we might generally assume that the hon. Member was wrong in his illustrations, though by accident he was sometimes right. The hon. Member mentioned two gentlemen only, one of whom was Mr. Bassett. Curiously enough, that gentleman was backed by a large number of tenant farmers, and Nationalist tenant farmers, too. That gentleman's testimonials also contained one from the Roman Catholic clergyman of Downpatrick, one from a clergyman of the Irish Church, and one from a minister of the Presbyterian Church. It was true that the bundle also contained some testimonials from landlords, but a more impartial and a stronger set of testimonials was never produced before a Chief Secretary. That was one of the illustrations of the hon. Member for East Mayo, and if the hon. Gentleman had given more he might have been able to deal with them in the same way. Was it to be assumed, was it credible that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would be so foolish as to appoint men to please this Member or that, or this landlord or that, and so barter away his own reputation as Chief Secretary and as a statesman? He knew Lord Spencer took the greatest care in interviewing each candidate when he was appointing Sub-Commissioners. And what did the present Chief Secretary do? A number of Lord Spencer's Land Commissioners had ceased to be in office because they were no longer required, and so were set aside, and he found that the present Chief Secretary re-appointed all of them, with, he believed, one exception; so that as far as 25 out of his 42 appointments were concerned, he appointed men who had been appointed by the previous Government. ["Hear, hear!"] So much for the appointment of those Commissioners by the Chief Secretary. As far as he was acquainted with them he was entirely satisfied with them. He spoke as the representative of a tenant farmer constituency, and his opinion was that the Commissioners had been remarkably well appointed. Speaking on behalf of his constituency, he might say that he was entirely satisfied with them, and he believed his constituents were entirely satisfied with him. ["Hear, hear!"] He therefore said that in his opinion the charges that had been made against the Land Commissioners in the past had not been well made. No man had a right to interfere with the freedom of contract between landlord and tenant, that was the position taken up by the landlords. A tenant should be allowed to pay what rent he pleased. That was the honest, downright truth—that the whole of the land legislation since 1881 was a wrong and an injustice of the strongest possible character. That was their position, but no impartial outsider could say that some legislation was not necessary in the matter of the vexed question of landlord and tenant in Ireland. [Cries of "No, no!"] Some of his friends said "No, no!" but he was glad that opinion came from an English Member; it certainly could not come from an Irish Member. ["Hear, hear!"] They had last night a most important Irish Bill blocked by an English Member, who had never been in Ireland at all. [Cheers.] What was the state of affairs as to the tenants? The Member for Trinity College made that afternoon an extremely powerful speech, showing the hardships which the landlords had to endure. There was no Irish Member who did not know of such cases. They all knew that the landlords had suffered severely in the last 30 years. He did not believe that any Nationalist Member was anxious to rob the Irish landlords merely through vindictiveness. But what was the position of the tenants? How many thousands and tens of thousands were in distress? He would mention a case which came to his own knowledge within the last five hours. He could not give the names, but he should give the entire facts to any Member who doubted him. The case was this: there was a farm in a prosperous Ulster county. There were some fine buildings on it, the extent being 80 or 90 acres of land. The rent was fixed by the Land Commission, and the tenant was practically the owner. That tenant that afternoon offered the farm to a man home from Australia with a wife and three children. He was offered the land, stock, and farm for £300. The money was offered to him as a loan. The result of consideration was a letter to him from the man, asking that a situation might be obtained for him as a bus conductor or driver in London. [Cheers.] He told the man that he thought he was wise—["hear, hear!"]—and if his influence was as strong as he thought it was, that man would remain a London bus conductor and not an Antrim farmer. Only a few weeks ago he obtained from a Member of that House letters of introduction for two young men going out to Australia. They were forced to give up their farm, and at 35 years of age they were gone away to a new country without a penny in their pockets. The landlords' cases were unquestionably hard, but the instances he had given would show that the tenants' cases were also very hard. He had visited every one of the 32 counties of Ireland, and he knew that the position of the tenant farmers was one of extreme difficulty. He was certain, too, that the landlords had been hard hit. He had no reason to be more sympathetic with the tenant farmers than with the landlords; perhaps not so much, but he saw the difficulty from both sides of the question. One word with regard to the Commission which the Government intended to appoint. The landlords had asked for the Commission, the Nationalists had opposed it, and the Government had declared through the mouth of the Chief Secretary that the Commission was to be appointed. He was sorry that the Government had come to that conclusion; but at the same time he recognised the difficulty of the situation. A great deal had been said which he thought unjustifiable and unnecessary. It had been said, for example, that the Government in granting the Commission implied unfriendliness towards the tenant —[Nationalist cheers]. He was prepared for that cheer; but was not that a grave position for hon. Gentlemen opposite to take up in respect to a Commission the personnel of which they knew nothing? As a matter of fact the present Government had shown itself most favourable to the tenants. The Land Act of last year, for instance, was approved by the hon. and learned Member for North Louth. It was now assumed that the Commission about to be appointed must be necessarily a Commission unfriendly to the tenants. One hon. Gentleman had said, "You won't give every litigant who is dissatisfied with the tribunal a Royal Commission to try the tribunal." That was one way of stating the case, but it must be borne in mind that the landlord was a compulsory litigant. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: "All dependents are!"] But what was the position of the Irish tenant? The Act of 1881 was an Act without parallel in the history of the world. [Mr. T. M. HEALY: "No!"] The hon. and learned Member was a very good historian, and he would be glad to have an illustration from him of any Parliament or Senate of any country ever having transferred the ownership of the entire land of the country from one class to another. [Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: "India!"] The Chief Secretary believed there was something like it in India. He was not aware of the case; but his reading of the Act of 1881 led him to believe that the Act transferred the ownership of the land from the landlords to the tenants, that the landlords were absolute owners previous to 1881; but that since every incidence of ownership belonged to the tenant, that now the landlord was a rent charge and nothing else. He would have preferred that this Commission had not been granted, but he saw the reasons which must have induced the Government to grant it, namely, that the circumstances of Irish landlords and Irish tenants were an extraordinary set of circumstances, and that therefore there was nothing unnatural in trying remedies in this case which had never been tried before, and would not be tried in any other case. Who was the appointment of the Commission to affect? He thought its appointment would have two results, and that those results, as regarded time, would be divided into two parts. First, what would be the effect of the Commission between now and when it reported; and, secondly, what would be the effect after it had reported? As to the first point, suppose these non-permanent Sub-Commissioners were terrified by the coming Commission, and that they were very cowardly, very contemptible, and very unworthy men. If that were the case, and if they were doing fairly at the present time in lowering rents, and if they ceased to lower rents as much in the future between now and the Report of the Commission, then they would do so from cowardice. His confidence in them was higher than that of the hon. and learned Member for Louth. He knew of no "trembling wretches." He believed that the Sub-Commissioners who were doing their duty fearlessly in the past, would do it fearlessly in the future, no matter what happened to them. If there were such "trembling wretches," the Debate that night would have the effect of letting them see that they were not likely to be crushed, and that they would have as many standing up for them on that side of the House as on the other side, and that they might do their duty fearlessly.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: Does the hon. Member think that they keep their eye on the Debates in this House?

Mr. RENTOUL said he had reason to know they did. The hon. and learned Member for Louth had made his prophecy as to the effect of the Commission on these non-permanent Sub-Commissioners. He would make his prophecy, and that was, that there would be no effect upon them between now and the time it reported; that they would be very cowardly men who would be affected by it; and that the rents would not go down, and that there would be no appreciable difference in the conduct of the Land Commissioners between now and the time when the Royal Commission gave in its Report. As to the second point—what would be the effect of the Commission when it did report—he had so much confidence in the Land Commissioners that he believed its Report would be in approval of what the Land Commissioners had done. What was to be submitted to the Royal Commission? Not the personnel of the Land Commission, not the justice of their interference when they were fixing rents, but aye or no, were they doing their duty fairly, and were the reductions of rent at present given too great or too little in proportion to the present prices and the present difficulties of the farmers' position in general. He was not afraid of the judgment of the Commission in regard to that matter. He believed that the findings of the Land Commissioners would stand the test of the Royal Commission Inquiry, and that if any persons were in danger from the Report which it would make it would not be the tenants of Ireland. He did not, therefore, look upon the appointment of the Royal Commission as likely to be a boon to the landlords. They had asked for this Commission, and they were going to get it, but he questioned very much their wisdom in asking for it. He wanted the landlords of Ireland, who had now got their Commission, or would get it, to know the effect of the situation; and he wanted the tenant farmers to understand it, too. The tenant farmers might be extremely frightened when they heard that this Commission was about to be appointed. ["Hear, hear!"] But it was his earnest belief that there would be very little to frighten them, and that the Report would be a pat on the back for the Land Commissioners, for it would be found that they had done their duty fairly. That being so, he failed to see what the landlords could possibly gain. The situation was a difficult one from every point. One knew that the Irish landlords had suffered heavily, and one knew also that the difficulties of the tenants were no mere fictions. They saw in the past that the poverty of Ireland was so great when famine came that only a few weeks would bring the people to the verge of starvation, and sometimes to actual starvation. ["Hear, hear!"] That being so, he rejoiced at the Land Bill that was passed by the present Government. He believed that the hon. Member for North Louth said the Party he represented expressed their belief at the time that the Government had done well and honestly, and had acted a friendly part to the tenant farmers of Ireland in that Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] The Government had done nothing since to discredit their action on that occasion. They had now appointed a Commission. If it were true that they had appointed it in the interests of the landlords, and for the purpose of destroying the effect of the Land Act of last year, then, of course, the Government would be false to the tenant farmers, whom they then desired to benefit. But they had no proof of that whatever. Whilst he believed that the Commission would not do a particle of good, he was equally sure that it would do no harm whatever. The Government had granted it as an act of kindness to the landlords, who, he believed honestly, had been too hard hit, and he believed that too much had been done against them. But he believed also that they would get that satisfaction which people very often got from going to a Court of Appeal, only to find the decision of the Court below confirmed against them.

Mr. DENIS KILBRIDE (Galway, N.) had failed to arrive at a conclusion as to whether the hon. Member who had just sat down was a representative of the tenant farmers or of the landlords. The hon. and learned Gentleman began his speech by adverting to an illustration given by the hon. Member for East Mayo with regard to the composition of the Sub-Commissioners. He mentioned the name of a gentleman called Basset, who, he understood, was a constituent of his own. He (the speaker) took occasion to refer to the Return that was given to the hon. Member for South Down five or six weeks ago, and when he looked to see what the qualifications of Mr. Basset were, he found that he was a gentleman who never was obliged to make his living by the earning and the paying of rent. He held that the man who was best entitled to come to a just conclusion and form a just estimate of what fair rent ought to be between the average hard-working tenant and the fair landlord was the man who had practical experience of how to make, as well as of how to pay, rent. Mr. Basset might be an admirable man, and he did not desire to controvert anything that had been said in his favour. It might be true that he had a memorial signed by 200 farmers in the county of Down, it might be perfectly true that among these 200 there were some Nationalists, and it might be true that he had the signatures of both Protestant and Catholic ministers. But to bring that forward as proof of the fitness of any man in Ireland for any public position was trading upon the credulity of the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman knew, and those who sat around him (the speaker) knew—everyone of them knew that whether a man was a political friend or a political opponent, there was enough left, he was glad to say, of the milk of human kindness in the Irish heart to put a name to any memorial in favour of him. [Laughter.]

Mr. RENTOUL said he must remind the hon. Member that he did not bring forward Mr. Basset's name. He simply dealt with it by way of reply.

Mr. KILBRIDE: I dealt with it by way of illustration.

Mr. RENTOUL: And I by way of reply.

Mr. KILBRIDE: By way of reply in order to prove how unfortunate my hon. and learned Friend was in his illustration.

Mr. RENTOUL: Quite so.

Mr. KILBRIDE, continuing, said he found Mr. Basset described in the Return as a valuer and surveyor. He believed that for many years he was a clerk in the office of the Clerk of the Crown and Peace. [Mr. Rentoul: "Two or three years!"] That was how this gentleman acquired his knowledge of land. If the hon. Member for East Down wanted to defend Mr. Basset, why did he not tell the House what had been his occupation for years before he was put on the Sub-Commission? Had it been in his power to say, "This man is a practical farmer, he has paid rent because he made it," he would have been only too glad to say so. But he had kept back from the House—he said that advisedly—he had kept back his knowledge of the position this man held for years before his appointment as a clerk in the office of the Clerk of the Crown and Peace.

Mr. RENTOUL was sorry to interrupt, but he could not let that pass; otherwise it would seem that he was deceiving the House. The fact of Mr. Basset having been a clerk in the County Court had been already mentioned in the House before he spoke. He had no desire to keep back anything.

Mr. KILBRIDE said he did not remember hearing the fact referred to by any hon. Member. Mr. Basset, he found, had never farmed land for himself, either as owner or as tenant; but he had "farmed for a family." Well, he hoped that the "family" had a great deal of money; because he did not think that a clerk in a law office was the man most calculated to make a great deal of rent for a family.

It was stated that the Chief Secretary's reputation was at stake in making these appointments. He had no doubt the Chief Secretary acted as well as it was possible to do, and that he was actuated by a sincere desire to appoint the best and the most impartial men; but if that reputation had been at stake, surely it was now much more at stake since these appointments had been attacked by his own supporters. The right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the appointments, and was one of the objects of the Commission, therefore, to whitewash the tarnished reputation of the Chief Secretary? He commented on the fact that while the last speaker was neither a landlord nor a tenant farmer he was returned by the vote of tenant farmers, and while there were several gentlemen in the hon. and learned Member's constituency well qualified to act as lay Sub-Commissioners, only one appointment had been made. On the other hand, in other constituencies in the north of Ireland represented by landlords, several men had been appointed to act on the Land Commission. Were the Unionist and Presbyterian tenant farmers of Down satisfied with the rent reductions of the Sub-Commissioners? He ventured to tell the Committee that whether it was Nationalist farmers in Cork or Galway, or Unionist and Presbyterian farmers in Down and Antrim, they were all alike dissatisfied with the reductions they had received. While it was a regrettable thing to see country gentlemen, especially if they were sportsmen, being obliged to shut up their establishments and live in the cheaper Continental countries, still, that was a lesser evil than that large bodies of tenant farmers should be unable to find the necessaries of life for themselves and their families. A favourite argument on the other side was that the reductions in rent should be in direct proportion to the fall in prices, but his contention was that the Irish tenant farmers had not only been injuriously affected by the fall in agricultural values, but still more by the shrinkage in produce. But this shrinkage of produce was a thing that was carefully kept from the purview of the House by the advocates of the landlords. It never occurred to those hon. Gentlemen to recall the statement made by the present Judge Madden, then Attorney General, when he wanted the House to consent to the advance of 30 millions of British money to turn the Irish occupiers into Irish owners, the Irish landlords to run away with the swag—he told the House, on his responsibility as a Minister, that the interest of the tenant farmer in the soil was greater than that of the landlord. He should like to ask the representatives of the landlords why they, who were not absolute owners, but only co-partners with the tenants in going concerns, should expect 18 or 20 years' purchase of their interest, if the tenants, whose interest was declared by Mr. Justice Madden to be the greater, were not entitled to claim at least the same. The Marquess of Salisbury told a deputation of Irish landlords that in these days the interest which did not agitate was bound to go to the wall. He was glad that the noble Marquess had come to that conclusion, because at one time the most opprobrious term which could be applied to the Nationalist Members was that of "professional agitators." Now the whole of the Irish landlords, headed by the Duke of Abercorn, had successfully converted themselves into professional agitators. And if the landlords claimed to be heard in the House, it was equally within the rights of the tenant farmer to call attention to the fact that the reductions given by the Sub-Commissioners were wholly inadequate. The Chief Secretary would find that his policy of killing Home Rule with kindness would be made more difficult when they heard that this Royal Commission was to be appointed to decide whether they were to have any reductions or not. He had been anxious to hear the hon. Member for South Tyrone or the Attorney General for Ireland on this proposal, for they both represented tenant farmer constituencies. They must be opposed to it, for they knew that the Royal Commission was simply to whittle down reductions or to prevent the tenant farmers from getting any at all. It was said that the object of the Commission was to restore confidence in the Land Commission. How could it do that? If the Commission decided that the reductions given for the second statutory term were too great, would it establish confidence in the minds of the Irish tenant farmers? If the result of the Report was to restore the confidence of the landlords in the Land Court, it would lead to a fierce agitation on the part of the tenant farmers to induce some Court to give them the reductions to which they were entitled. On the other hand, if the Report should be that the reductions in rent were only commensurate with the necessities of the case, how would that restore the confidence of the landlords in the Land Court? The landlords would never have any confidence in any Court that reduced rent. He was opposed to the appointment of the Commission, because he objected to any further interference by this House or any other body with the judicial functions exercised by the Land Commission Courts. This was an attack upon the judicial Bench in Ireland. If it was right for the landlords to attack the Land Commissioners in their capacity as Judges, it was right for the Nationalists to attack the decisions of any of the other judicial tribunes in Ireland. When, some years ago, the Nationalist Members attacked in the House certain Judges in Ireland for their partiality to the Government in political cases, they were denounced for their want of respect for law and order. Now the attacks on Irish Judges did not come from the Nationalist Members, but from the loyal and patriotic body on the other side of the House—from the men who had so long posed as the advocates and defenders of law and order in Ireland.

MR. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.) said a more flagrant waste of public money than that involved in the Vote before the Commitee had never come under his observation. For what was the £130,000 to be spent? Was it to bring them to a final decision on the Irish land question? No; for no one had suggested that the Land Commission thus enforced would bring them one inch nearer to the end they desired to attain. The hon. Member for North Louth, with his usual acumen, tried to lead the Debate into a line which, if the colleagues of the hon. Member had followed, their speeches might have had more influence on the Committee. The hon. Gentleman had said that the House was asked to interfere with the decisions of a judicial body. The hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that an appeal like that was likely to be effectual with the House, but, unfortunately for him, a little light was thrown in the course of the Debate on those judicial bodies. The present system had been one long wrangle over the qualifications of this man or that man. Was there the slightest analogy between a judicial tribunal as we understood it in England, and this scratch pack of gentlemen who were performing a travesty of justice in Ireland? These gentlemen could not be compared with the early Judges who were appointed on the Land Commission, and who were permanent servants of the Crown. There were 53 of these temporary Assistant Commissioners, and he did not wish to say anything against them. He did not think anybody knew much about them, but they were human beings susceptible to the passions and temptations which swayed human beings, and it was very dangerous to set these men in judicial posts without taking steps to guard them against temptation. We made it our boast that our Judges, even in the humblest offices, were appointed for life, and were, therefore, removed from the temptation which any shorter appointment would lay them open to. It was inconceivable that these temporary assistants should not be suspected of being affected by such considerations. They had heard something as to the process by which they were selected. A member of the British Bench was selected by probably the fiercest form of competition to which a man could be subjected, namely, by the process of trial among his peers, and that, too, in one of the most competitive professions that existed. In addition to this they surrounded him with every precaution necessary in the interests of justice. They had heard, however, that these gentlemen were appointed on the strength of a shoal of testimonials. He did not blame the Chief Secretary, who had to make the best of the bewildering mass of information put before him, but that was not the way to obtain Judges in whom confidence could be placed. As an example of the sort of man who was appointed he cited the case of one gentleman, a tenant, chiefly self taught, who had visited various farms. That was not the qualification which was needed for settling for all time to come the affairs of a certain number of Her Majesty's subjects. They ought to have in a Judge the power to discern between two cases presented with equal force, and the faculty of impartiality. All this talk about the Land Commissioners, whether they were deciding fairly whether the rents should be lowered or raised was beside the mark. He did not think the problem was capable of solution by any tribunal which could be set up. Given this infinite multiplicity of sham Judges, they were no nearer finality on this question. In 1897 the Land Commissioners were beginning exactly where they were in 1881. The Courts were crowded with suitors, and hon. Members opposite said the plethora of cases in the Courts prevented decisions being given. Sheaves of applications for fair rents to be fixed were pouring in. Recent land legislation for Ireland had been exceptional legislation, and its inception was presented as a remedy for an emergency. A remedy for an emergency was not a remedy for all time. It was doing incalculable mischief to the landlords, and hon. Members opposite did not profess that any benefit had accrued to the tenant.

MR. DILLON: We said that so great had been the fall in prices that reductions of rent have not made the tenant as well off as under the old rent of 20 years ago. That is due to the agricultural depression.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said that precisely the same complaint was made of the operations of the recent Land Acts as was made of the operation of the Land Act of 25 years ago. His point was that we were not advancing in this matter one inch, and the demoralisation that had occurred was beyond belief. He would appeal to English Members. They were apt to think they had but slight interest in this, but he would point out that the demoralisation had spread to this side of the water, and that already they had presented to the House a Bill based on predatory and dishonest principles in regard to the Principality of Wales. It was not based on the law of England, on the Ten Commandments, or on common sense, but was based line by line on the precedent followed in the Randt. What had been said by the First Lord of the Treasury was a summary of the whole of the possibilities of the question. It was impossible to go back to the state of things that existed before 1881. The First Lord of the Treasury had said that there was one issue, and one issue alone, out of this terrible faux pas into which they had got, and that was by doing away with dual ownership and restoring the single ownership of land. He agreed with this. He could not believe it was in the interest of any section in Ireland, except the attorneys, that the present condition of things should go on. He believed that this annually increasing Vote for the Land Commission was a curse to Ireland, and that the people who were living upon it were the lawyers. For every pound of rent reduction in Ireland since the Act of 1881 was passed, there had been an expenditure of two pounds to bring about that reduction. The cost of the maintenance of the Land Commission and the cost of litigation largely exceeded the whole of the reductions of rent. But whether that were so or not, nobody could pretend that what was happening was to the advantage of Ireland. He believed that until they looked on the Land Commissioners and their work in the daylight of common-sense, until they asked themselves whether they were doing things in Ireland which they should dare to see done in England and Scotland, they should not get much further in this matter. When they had noblemen like Lord Dufferin speaking as he had recently done on this question, it was calculated to make pause even the most enthusiastic advocate of the existing land system in Ireland. They were told that, among the many other miseries the Land Commission had inflicted upon Ireland, they were now doing all in their power to obstruct purchase, although everyone who wished well to Ireland desired that the wheels of the machinery of land purchase should be oiled. He believed that could be done even under the bad and incomplete system that existed. He believed it ought and could be improved with very little trouble, and he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for the University of Dublin that if purchase was to be made a success, it could only be made so on terms of ample generosity to the parties whose property was compulsorily taken from them.

MR. J. DALY (Monaghan, S.) regretted that the hon. Member opposite should have thought fit to call the Land Court a "sham" Court, and to apply the epithet "suspect" to the Judges of that tribunal. The hon. Member for West Belfast and those who acted with him had succeeded in cowing the Government who had bent the knee to the few landlords from Ireland who had seats in that House. Last year, when the Land Act was before them, they were told by the Government that they would hear nothing more about the land question for a very long time, and yet, before 12 months had elapsed since the passing of that Act, this proposal to appoint a Commission was made. He feared that the effect of this new policy would be to cow the Land Sub-Commissioners. There were few of the Sub-Commissioners who were not needy men, and when needy men had obtained appointments they were naturally disinclined to relinquish them. This action of the landlords he regarded as merely a game of bluff, although, no doubt, they had carried their point. Because the landlords, acting on the advice of Lord Salisbury, were agitating while the people were quiet and orderly, the former were going to be aided and the peasants injured. Perhaps the peasants would have to follow the landlords' example. They had heard from the right hon. and learned Member for Trinity College, Dublin, a good deal about the sorry plight of some of the landlords in Ireland. In considering their case, it should be taken into account that these gentlemen or their predecessors had lived very extravagantly in their time. If they had not done so, they would not be so hard up now. Time after time, when the privations and grievances of the people of Ireland had been brought forward in that House, it had been impossible to extract a sympathetic word from hon. Gentlemen opposite, but now, because a few landlords pretended that they were hard up, the right hon. and learned Member for Trinity College almost wept over their distress.

Mr. HUBERT DUNCOMBE (Cumberland, Egremont) claimed to move "That the Question be now put," but the Chairman of Ways and Means withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Mr. J. DALY said that what distressed him was to see poor people leaving Ireland for America in order that they might earn rent for the landlords.

And, it being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA (HEALTH).

Debate on the Motion of the Earl of DUNRAVEN to resolve:—

> "That in view of the Report of the Departmental Committee of the India Office of the 20th day of February 1897, it is, in the opinion of this House, urgently necessary that an inquiry be made into the effect of contagious diseases upon the Forces of the Crown, the civil population, and the native races within Her Majesty's dominions, and into the nature and results of the measures which are or have been in force in this and other countries for the prevention of such diseases."

Resumed (according to Order).

*LORD REAY said that no one who had been responsible for any part of the administration of India could fail to recognise the extreme gravity of this question. The whole tendency of modern legislation was in favour of making the public acquainted with the laws of hygiene and of enforcing hygienic conditions. They segregated lunatics, lepers, habitual drunkards; and there seemed to be no reason why the same principle should not prevail in this case. This protection of the public health was due to the conviction that society in self-defence had to legislate. The progress of medicine had placed at their disposal effectual means for dealing with this disease, and the object of the measures contemplated in the Secretary of State's Dispatch seemed to him to be to diffuse these means and to place them at the disposal of those who required them, and to leave no excuse for neglect, the result of ignorance. He hoped that the re-opening of the hospitals would be among the first steps to be taken, and that every inducement would be held out to visit these hospitals. Apart from the general considerations which governed this matter, there were special considerations which applied to India. In India the causes which operated in favour of restraint were not as strong as they were in this country. The factor of racial difference was a very important one to take into account, and their obligations as the ruling race could not be overlooked. From the very nature of the circumstances they were exposed in India to constant criticism by very subtle minds of everything which was left undone by the State. In India, besides, private initiative was much weaker than it was in this country; and what was left to the numerous charitable and benevolent agencies in this country must in India be undertaken by the State; hence the Government of India undertook a great many duties and functions which in this country were left to private initiative. At this very time our Indian Administrators were grappling, and he trusted sucessfully, with famine and plague. This scourge was more serious than the bubonic fever. The latter was not concealed, not chronic, and capable of prophylactic treatment. This visitation was permanent, occult, insidious. The utmost vigilance was needed. Another and most important aspect of this question was the moral aspect. They removed their young soldiers from those influences which surrounded their homes, and from which they were not removed where the Army system left them to serve with the colours in their own districts, and with men taken from all classes of society. They were removed to other parts of the world, to other climatic conditions, to surroundings which in many respects were not conducive to a high moral standard. He fully recognised what had been done for their benefit, but in this direction certainly more could and should be done. He had been very pleased to hear what the noble and gallant Lord had said of the Presbyterian chaplain at Meerut. He believed that more instances could be given of similar efforts by Army chaplains and by commanding officers. It was by individual effort and example that they would be able to strike at the root of this evil; and, if it was important to mitigate its results, it was certainly more important to remove its causes, to create a healthy environment, to improve the moral tone. The whole tone of society had been altered with regard to intemperance; that precedent was encouraging for those who believed that other evils might be grappled with in the same way—evils which struck at the vigour of our race. He heartily endorsed, therefore, the instructions which had been given to the Government of India in the 14th paragraph of the Secretary of State's Dispatch. There was no antagonism between the scientific means and the moral means which could be used to prevent and to cure disease. There was a double duty to be discharged by the combined forces of State agency and of moral and religious agency. The Government of India had a perfect right to expect that in their renewed endeavours to deal with this evil they should have all the support which could be given them both here and in India in order to remove this frightful blot on our civilisation. He agreed with the noble Earl opposite, the Under Secretary of State, that there was no further need for inquiry. The evidence contained in the Papers which had been laid on the Table seemed to him to be overwhelming; and delay seemed unwarrantable after the representations received from the Royal Colleges of Physicians and Surgeons showing that immediate action was necessary. One of the conditions, if not one of the foundations, of our rule in India was moral prestige; and he saw in the Instructions which had been given to the Government of India by Her Majesty's Government an endeavour to strengthen our moral prestige. ["Hear, hear!"]

*LORD LISTER, on rising to address the House for the first time, was received with cheers. He said: It is not necessary for me to add to the evidence already brought before your Lordships as to the appalling gravity of the subject referred to in the Resolution of the noble Earl or to the tremendous importance of syphilitic disease and its far-reaching effects, not only to the person who contracts it, but to innocent women and children and to future generations. On this point I make one remark, that there is perhaps no more difficult thing for a surgeon to do than to give advice to a man when it is safe for him to enter into matrimony when he has once contracted syphilis. I cordially welcome the action that has been taken by the Secretary for India in his recent Dispatch enacting that venereal disease shall no longer be allowed to run riot in the Army in India, as it has of late years, but that it shall be dealt with on the same principles as small-pox and other contagious or infectious diseases. I confess that for my part I should have been well pleased to have waited for the regulations which I believe the authorities in India are endeavouring to make, in accordance with the Dispatch of the Secretary of State, to see how far those regulations might be really efficient for the great object in view; but as the matter has been brought forward, I feel bound to say that the Dispatch has been hampered with restrictions which I cannot help fearing will seriously interfere with its utility. I will only refer to two of those restrictions. It is stated that there must be no compulsory and periodical examination of women, and the Dispatch proceeds to say that the cantonment rules which are in operation for other contagious or infectious diseases shall come into operation as regards venereal disease. Rule 5 says that—

> "If the medical officer for the time being in charge of any such hospital is informed, on testimony which he believes to be credible, that any person living in the cantonment is suffering from cholera, typhoid, smallpox, &c., he may, by notice, require such person to attend at the hospital at a time to be mentioned in such notice."

Then Rule 6 says—

> "If any person on whom any such notice as is mentioned in the last preceding rule shall have been served shall refuse or neglect to attend at the hospital in pursuance of such notice, he shall be deemed to be suffering from such disease as aforesaid, and to have refused to go to the hospital."

And then, Rule 7 sets forth that on the representation of the medical officer to the cantonment magistrate that such refusal has occurred, the person concerned who has refused may be expelled from the cantonment. Now, with regard to such diseases as small-pox, this regulation is, of course, perfectly satisfactory. Such a disease and the others enumerated carry upon their face the evidence of their existence by symptoms that any medical man can at once discern. But with venereal disease the case is totally different. In the early stages of the complaint, in which it is of the most essential consequence that it should be recognised—for efficient treatment depends upon early recognition—there is no general effect whatsoever produced upon the system.

The person appears to all ordinary examination perfectly healthy, and it is only by special examination, which it is enacted shall not be compulsory, that evidence of the disease can be obtained. How can any notice be given to the medical man that a person has such a disease? Who is to give the notice? In truth it is the fact of prostitution, not evidence of the presence of venereal disease, on which the authorities must proceed. It may possibly be said that the Dispatch of the Secretary of State may be so construed that the mere fact of prostitution may be regarded as affording reasonable probability that the disease exists, and, therefore, justifying action. If that be the construction put upon the Dispatch my objection on that point would of course fall to the ground; but this is just one of the matters on which I should have liked to have waited to see how the regulations could be framed. If they can be framed in the sense I have referred to they may be so far efficacious. Then as to periodical examination. Suppose that any woman affected with venereal disease has been examined, treated and cured, after a certain time there will be just the same reason for re-examination to ascertain whether she may not be again diseased as there was in the first instance, and, therefore, in order that the regulations may be effectual, there must be periodical examination. If it be said that this would be very like the reintroduction of the Contagious Diseases Acts, I must frankly confess that I have no objection in principle to these Acts. ["Hear, hear!"] It is admitted on all hands that prostitution cannot be dealt with criminally as an offence; but on the other hand if any woman chooses to place herself in such a position as to become a notorious source of serious danger to the community it seems to me only reasonable that public steps should be taken to minimise that danger. The Contagious Diseases Acts required that in order that any woman might be subjected compulsorily to examination a magistrate must be satisfied by sufficient evidence that she was a notorious prostitute. Of course, if there was any deficiency in the Act, not giving the woman charged the most ample chance of refuting the charge, that, of course, should be amended, but as regards the principle there seems to me nothing to be objected to. In the Act of 1866 there was one matter which I did not like, and that was that when the woman had been treated and was pronounced to be clear of the disease, she received a certificate of such healthiness which she was to carry about with her. Now that, I confess, savours pretty strongly of public licensing of immoral conduct; but in the Act of 1869 that was done away with. The certificate was no longer given to the woman but to the police authorities, and this surely was perfectly right, with a view to the necessary periodical examinations. The Acts made special provision for chaplains to attend the women under treatment in hospital, with a view to their moral improvement. And I have been informed, on what I believe to be credible testimony, that it was not a rare thing for them to be restored to a virtuous course of life; and this does not surprise me. I know as a hospital surgeon how very wholesome a moral influence residence in hospital does exert upon people of the lower classes. I have often thought a severe accident might often have been a blessing in disguise to these poor people, who have, perhaps, first learnt what respect and gratitude are. For I am proud to say in the medical profession the same humane and kindly care is given to the most degraded as to the most exalted. [Cheers.] And surely it was a most merciful thing to provide treatment for these women free of charge, and cure them of their loathsome diseases. I have a very old friend whom I highly respect, a clergyman, who, at the time the Contagious Diseases Acts were in operation, knew many clergymen connected with the towns where the Acts were in force, and he tells me that without one solitary exception all those persons expressed approval of the effects of those Acts. [Cheers.] If we turn to the effects upon the disease as such, I have been given to understand that medical men who visited the Lock Hospital in London at the time when it was used not only for ordinary cases but also for cases under the Contagious Diseases Acts, were struck with the extraordinary contrast between the two classes, as, indeed, must necessarily have been the case. The Government cases were, as a rule, very mild ones, because they had been taken in the early stages of the disease, while the converse was seen in the poor creatures who had come in of their own accord because they could walk the streets no longer. I have received a letter from a gentleman who has been for 14 years in medical practice in Brisbane in Australia, and who has now returned to England. He was in a peculiarly favourable position for judging of the effects of the Acts. At the outset he had a great objection to it on moral grounds, and when he first went there he took the chair at a public meeting in opposition to the Act. The Act, however, was not abolished, and he now speaks in unqualified approval of the effect of the Act in the town of Brisbane, venereal diseases in the whole community having become immensely reduced, not only in number, but in virulence; so that when any virulent case occurred they were able to trace it to outside places, where the Act did not operate. His only objection to the Act is that, as he says, the women are humbled, while nothing is done to deal with the men who may reinfect them. I confess that objection seems a somewhat sentimental one as regards the civil population, because, in the first place, I do not think the poor women need complain very much of the way in which they are treated; and, in the second place, to deal with the men in the civil population on the same lines is an absolute impossibility. But, on the other hand, this is by no means impossible in the Army—["hear, hear!"]—and I was exceedingly glad to hear that Lord Roberts approved of periodical inspection of the soldiers. I can conceive no objection whatsoever to such a course; only let it be done, not, as I am told it is sometimes done, in a sort of parade, where the young fellows seem rather to glory in having such diseases, but let every soldier be introduced, as it were solemnly, into the surgeon's room and examined on the understanding that it is a very, very serious matter. Every recruit is examined in this way. Those who are diseased would certainly have no ground of complaint; and those who are healthy may be made to feel that by undergoing these examinations they are contributing to the general good. Such periodic inspections of the men would unquestionably remove a great source of contamination, and render the Act still more beneficial. For my part, therefore, I see no objection to the Act; on the contrary, I think it was a most beneficent one; and I cannot help on this occasion expressing the hope that at no distant period it may be reintroduced into this country. [Cheers.] But, then, it is said, supposing it has worked well in this country, it has been a failure in India. No doubt in India it has not done all that was expected of it. One of the reasons for this is the short-service system already alluded to by other speakers, and the more frequent moving of the troops. And to these must be added, as a most important element, the imperfect and partial manner in which the Acts have been worked. With regard to this point I have important evidence from Surgeon-General Payne, who had medical control of the working of the Acts in Calcutta from 1869 to 1879, the former year being that in which the Acts came into operation. The Cantonment Act, which was introduced in 1864, did not apply to Fort William, but to the civil population of Calcutta only, and so acted only in an indirect way on the health of the soldiers. In a Dispatch to the India Office Surgeon-General Payne writes:—

> "The garrison of Fort William in 1872 illustrated the worst effects of a newly-arrived regiment bringing disease to those sections of the town which the soldiers frequent. At the close of 1871 the men of the 19th Foot left Calcutta, after two years' residence, almost without a case of syphilis. The headquarters' wing of the 114th Regiment took its place, coming from Cawnpore, where the men had suffered heavily from the disease. They were not inspected on their arrival. From their arrival to the end of April there were many cases admitted into hospital. . . . By the end of April the mischief was arrested. . . . The health of the garrison forcibly exemplified all that has been said, here and elsewhere, of the effect of the movement of troops. I had ventured to predict that the year 1873 would find the 114th Regiment as free from disease as their predecessors had become. The event fully justified the prediction, and, on the arrival of the 3rd Buffs, our former experience was utilised by the regimental authorities. There were 12 or 13 venereal cases under treatment at the time, and, at my suggestion, an inspection of the entire regiment was held. It resulted in the detection and removal to hospital of between 30 and 40 cases, and no new cases occurred for months afterwards."

This seems to me to be most important evidence. ["Hear, hear!"] It is further stated by the same authority that within the first four years during which the Act was in operation under his supervision, taking cases of primary disease originating in Calcutta, the percentage was reduced from 7 per cent. to 1·4 per cent. That is exceedingly important evidence as to what, even in India, can be done if the Acts are energetically and properly worked. ["Hear, hear!"] I am aware that in remote districts there may be especial difficulties; but I am pleased beyond measure to hear Lord Roberts state that in his opinion, without anything that can be fairly construed as a direct encouragement of vice, measures might be taken in the cantonments which would have the effect of enormously diminishing the evil of which we are speaking. I trust, therefore, my Lords, whether the Inquiry which the noble Lord has requested be instituted or not—and I confess I myself would rather see it deferred, for fear it might appear, as in the case of the Vaccination Commission, to hold out the idea that the case was not sufficiently proved—[cheers]—I trust, whether the Inquiry be instituted or not, that this House will give distinct encouragement to the Government of India to persevere in the good and Christian course on which they have entered. [Cheers.]

*Lord PLAYFAIR said that the speech of his distinguished Friend who had just addressed the House was very important from a medical point of view. But he thought that Lord Lister did not give sufficient importance to the fact that, unless the new regulations were made sufficiently consonant with public feeling, it would be impossible, without a great struggle, to carry them into effective operation either in this country or in India. ["Hear, hear!"] Public opinion was now risng very much in favour of effective measures being taken to remove what was a great scandal to the nation. The evidence was perfectly conclusive as to the increase, not only in extent, but in malignancy, of the disease among our troops in India; and the public should never forget what a disease it is. It is a disease which the great specialist Ricord described as "the most terrible contagion which ever threatened mankind." It is terrible to the sufferer and to his descendants. Ordinary diseases exhausted their ill effects on the persons attacked by them; but syphilis descended to innocent children of parents tainted by it, either by direct transmission or by the degeneration of their constitution. Other diseases which followed from it on account of degeneracy of constitution had very much increased. The public should satisfy themselves on one point—it had been conclusively proved that the disease could be controlled by hygienic agencies. Those agencies had failed of recent years, because they had not been properly and efficiently carried out. The disease, in its major form, was prevented to a great extent in all the armies of European nations, while England was the only nation which allowed it to be dangerously prevalent among its soldiers, both at home and abroad. When the German army had succeeded in reducing the ratio of syphilis to 5½ per 1,000, was it not scandalous that the English Army at home should have a ratio of about 100 to the 1,000, and that in India of at least 175 per 1,000? ["Hear, hear!"] No doubt service in an Eastern country rendered it more difficult to repress the disease; but other countries had to encounter these difficulties. The Dutch soldiers serving in the East Indies suffered from the minor forms of venereal disease to a large extent, but they kept under control the major form of the disease, which prevailed only to one-third of the extent among our British troops. The Dutch army in the East Indies formerly had a ratio of syphilitic disease among their troops of 47 in 1,000, but this had been reduced in recent years to 37 per 1,000; while the English Army in India had a ratio of 175 to 1,000, and this had increased in recent years to 259 per 1,000. It was obvious that our bad administration of hygienic measures was responsible for the state of the British Army in India. Racial differences no doubt largely influenced the susceptibility of individuals in regard to the disease; but even these could not explain why, for all forms of venereal disease, the Japanese army had the low ratio of 34 to 1,000, while the British Army in India had 500 to 1,000. The United Kingdom might justly boast that since 1845 it had led the way in all sanitary reforms, and had greatly improved the health and lessened the mortality, while it increased the working ability of all classes of the population. There was only this exception—that in regard to this one class of diseases, the most repulsive and horrible of all, England stood now far behind all European nations. In the Report of the

> "Improved sanitation has had the very greatest effect upon every disease other than venereal; this alone has not only been unchecked in recent years, but has increased to an extent which is appalling and disastrous."

Up to 1887 the sanitary regulations in India, though they were inefficient to extirpate this class of diseases among our soldiers, were at least effective in preventing their increase. But in 1887 Parliament intervened, on account of the supposed State approval of an immoral trade, and since then the obnoxious regulations had been repealed by successive Secretaries of State for India, but no new powers had been given to the military authorities to apply more efficient sanitary measures. There was no want of knowledge as to how the disease could be prevented. There were moral means of prevention; and there were physical means, both excellent when worked in co-operation; but unfortunately they had drifted into a sharp antagonism. ["Hear, hear!"] The religious and moral agencies had tried to impress upon the soldier the heinousness of the sin which led to the disease. Lord Roberts had described the measures which had been adopted to remove soldiers from temptation by establishing reading rooms and regimental workshops, while various means of occupation and recreation had been furnished. Societies for promoting temperance and for repressing vice had done good work in the Army. The fruit of these combined efforts were seen in the general elevation of morality in the Army. Drunkenness and crime had greatly lessened among our soldiers in India. Yet all those social and moral agencies had failed to stay the increase of venereal diseases among our troops. They had failed as completely as the weakened sanitary regulations in use since 1887. The basis of all hygienic measures for preventing the spread of contagious diseases was isolation of the diseased from the healthy, and the application of curative methods to the diseased person. Parliament had in recent years enforced notification of contagious diseases such as cholera, small-pox, scarlet fever, and typhoid from the individual patient to the sanitary authority, which was empowered to see that isolation was effective, either at the home of the patient or in the hospital. This law of notification and isolation had been extended to our Army in India and prevailed in cantonments; but, though applicable to zymotic diseases generally, was no longer applied to the foul and malignant disease of syphilis. Yet it had been known for centuries that isolation was the only effective means of preventing the extension of this disease. Thus in 1497 Edinburgh was violently attacked by syphilis, then called "grandgore," and the Privy Council of Scotland ordered the magistrates of Edinburgh to collect, on a certain day, all the diseased women, accompanied by their doctors, on the sands of Leith, where boats were provided to transport both women and doctors to the island of Inchkeith—[laughter]—and there the women had to remain until the disease was cured on pain of being branded. This was a high-handed isolation, but could only be partially successful, because the diseased men do not seem to have been isolated. Compulsory isolation, as now applied by law to zymotic or filth diseases, ought still more rigorously to be applied to venereal diseases. The military authorities, in regard to venereal diseases, should at least have as full powers as those given by the Diseases Notification Act. They should, therefore, be enabled to discover the cases of disease and to enforce the effective isolation of the diseased. There was a fear that the active interference of the State in grappling with the evils of a dangerous immoral trade, overtly carried on among our soldiers, implied a State recognition and approval of the trade. Recognition there certainly was, but approval was not implied in making regulations for the supervision of any dangerous trades. ["Hear, hear!"] At one time the Church was intrusted with regulating the immoral traffic in cities, but though that involved recognition it did not imply approval of notorious sin. In 1430 the Bishop of Winchester was charged by Ordinance to regulate and supervise 18 houses of bad repute which stood on Bankside, Southwark, but this involved no Episcopal approval of the immoral traffic carried on in them. The Secretary of State for India, in his Despatch of March 27, had been careful to point out how much more efficient regulations could be applied in the cantonments in India without recurring to those measures which affected the public feeling in this country. If the societies for the prevention of vice were satisfied with these assurances they might aid the authorities very much by co-operating with them in their renewed endeavours, by every form of moral and hygienic agency, to remove the national scandal of our Army being the worst in Europe in regard to those loathsome diseases. The case was urgent, and admitted of no delay. But the Resolution proposed by the noble Lord for a new Inquiry would certainly be used by the opponents of hygienic measures as a justification for further postponing the more active measures promised in the Dispatch of the Secretary of State for India. So far as they went they were good proposals, though they did not go far enough, but if they were effective in removing the antagonism and securing the co-operation of the religious and moral societies which acted on public opinion in 1887 and forced the military authorities to weaken their administration of the regulations, he looked with hope to this new effort of the Government. If it was met in the manly spirit of co-operation indicated in the speech of the Archbishop of Canterbury he would have great hopes of the success of the new measures indicated in the Dispatch. Hygienic prevention and moral prevention could well work in co-operation. He trusted that this would be the spirit which might in future prevail among the societies which arose under different conditions. At present, if he might judge from circulars which he had received in the last few days, they still seemed inclined to retain their old position of antagonism to hygienic regulations. He did not want them to alter their attitude of watchfulness; but why should they not join their means of moral improvement with those of hygienic improvement and help the authorities to restrain a frightful disease which was rapidly increasing in extent and malignancy among our soldiers in India? ["Hear, hear!"]

*THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, after the able speeches which you heard on Friday night from Lord Roberts and from the noble Earl who brought the subject forward, and after the admirable way they were supported to a great extent by the Primate, I am hardly justified in intruding myself on your Lordships on this occasion, having no further personal responsibility with matters connected with the Army. But having been so long at the head of the Army, and having had for many years the opportunity of seeing the effects that existed before all those regulations were done away with, I must entreat of you to reflect well before you come to any resolution adverse to what has been brought to your notice by the noble Earl. No one can have any adequate idea of the miserable results produced by the doing away of the regulations, especially in India. But I do not take up this matter from the Army point of view, though that is of the greatest importance; I take it up from the civil point of view. We must always bear in mind that a large number of young men must now annually return from India; and if they return in a condition to propagate this horrible disease in the civil community at home the misery caused is untold. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore we ought to lose no time in putting a stop, if possible, to the laxity, or whatever you like to call it, with which this subject has been treated of late years, particularly in India. I have a very strong opinion also that morality would not suffer. I firmly believe, from all I have heard, that many of those poor creatures who formerly suffered, and propagated this miserable disease, absolutely gave up their immoral life as a result of the cure which they had obtained in good hospitals, and because they found that if they continued their immoral life they would become altogether outcasts of the world. The result was that they gave up this very vice which everybody wishes to see modified. I say modified, because the most rev. Prelate will forgive me for saying that you must change human nature before you can get rid of the vice altogether. ["Hear, hear!"] I am afraid even the Bench of Bishops, with his Grace at their head, cannot effect that object, but can only look forward to the mitigation of this vice. I support most fully and entirely the views which were expressed by the most rev. Prelate, but the difficulty is to find the means of effecting his object. Lord Roberts has told you, and I tell you also on the part of the whole Army, that we do everything, and have done everything of late years, to facilitate and make acceptable the barrack life of the soldier. We have introduced—and the noble Marquess near me will, no doubt, if he speaks, express the same view—every sort of recreation and useful occupation and interest that can ameliorate the monotony of barrack life. This has been gradually and is daily being introduced into our service, and more particularly in India, where it is more required even than at home. A great improvement in the soldiers' condition and the soldiers' sentiments has been produced as a result, and it is felt by the military authorities that the more this policy is carried out and the more we do in that direction, the better. This will have a great effect, I hope, in time in producing morality to a greater extent than it exists at this moment among Her Majesty's Forces. I do not believe myself that you can absolutely look forward to any very great mitigation of this miserable condition of things unless you treat the subject fully and fairly on its own merits, or, rather, I should say, its demerits. The demerits are so plain that I cannot conceive that anybody who has right or proper feeling, or delicacy of feeling, can have any doubt on that subject. I can only tell your Lordships that this subject is of such enormous importance to the civil population that not a day, not an hour, should be lost in introducting stringent and decided regulations, and every effort should be made to put a stop to what is really a most miserable and cruel condition of things. Imagine the civil population infected with this miserable disease! A great many of the men who come home are, I know, very seriously diseased. You cannot control them; they go into the civil population; you do not even know what becomes of them; and then they propagate this very horrible disease. This is owing to the laxity, if I may say so, with which we have looked after our men in India. The disease can certainly be controlled in India, though it may not be easy to control it elsewhere. One of the reasons why it is not controlled as it ought to be is, I am sorry to say, that the medical inspections referred to by the noble Lord are not carried out now as they used to be. ["Hear, hear!"] In my early days there was no sort of hesitation in regard to the matter; nobody questioned for a moment that every individual soldier should be inspected once a week. I do not see why this disease is to be treated on a different footing from smallpox, or any other disease the subjects of which are immediately taken to the hospital and there dealt with. Without inspection we are not in a position to deal with this disease because we know nothing about it. Nobody of either sex would confess to such a disease unless there are means of finding out that it exists. I, for one, was always strongly of opinion that medical inspection was essential, not only in the interests of the Army, but of the population at large. I regret, therefore, more than I can say, that I was not able to carry out those views which I personally entertained. I think we ought to lose no time in the matter. I quite agree with the noble Lord that if it is found essential to go further into details, it should be done, but I should hardly think it was, because I think we have details enough to satisfy any reasonable mind. [Cheers.] If there is a necessity for further statistical information be it so, but do not on that account delay for an hour or a moment the regulations, rules, and orders which are required. If they are not found strong enough, I hope there will be no hesitation in going even further, although it is distasteful, I know, in many quarters. It is a most fearful thing that the general population of this country should be in danger of infection, and that the happiness of the generations to come should also be endangered. ["Hear, hear!"] It is not only to the present, but to the future, that we must look, and there will be much danger to future generations if something very serious is not done. I have no idea what Her Majesty's Government intend to do, but I hope they mean absolutely to stick to their determination to go on with those regulations which they have already decided to carry out in India. If those are not found sufficient to mitigate the disease, I hope they will go on with stronger regulations and stronger rules, progressing with caution and prudence, and without hurry, in order to reduce it in every way that is possible. In the meantime, whilst doing that, everything that can be done should be done to prevent the young men shut up in barracks from being induced to overlook that morality which we all would like to see, not only in the Army, but in every portion of Her Majesty's dominions. [Cheers.]

*THE BISHOP OF SOUTHWELL thought the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Roberts) scarcely gave credit to the wider range of differences that existed between those who regarded this matter from different points of view. The attitude which had been adopted by some of those who were opposed to these regulations had been characterised as unchristianlike, but it should not be forgotten that it was also unchristianlike to purchase small children to fill up the bazaars for our soldiers, or to take possession of native women for our soldiers' use. We might find, moreover, that this was dangerous from a statesman's point of view, and might give even more cause for discontent and disturbance in India than did in the past certain memorable cartridges. He thought that the periodic examination of the soldiers which had been alluded to might remove one of the chief objections to which importance had been attached—namely, that there should be no difference of treatment between the men and the women. If future statistics dealt with regiments, good and bad marks might be attached to regiments as to individuals, and penalties should be attached personally to colonels of regiments which showed moral deterioration. He lived many years in a garrison town, and he knew that the character of a regiment depended very much on its colonel. If those under him, when a head-master of a public school, or now, as Bishop of a diocese, deteriorated, it would be quite right if he were removed. He did not see why there should not be some kind of official judgment on the heads of regiments as well as on the soldiers themselves. As to a further inquiry, he hoped the details obtained by the last Commission would not have to be repeated and gone through again. No good would be done by it. ["Hear, hear!"] One thing was made clear by the old Report—that waves of virulence such as had occasioned the present movement were not due either to the Acts being carried out or neglected, but to local conditions due to some campaign in new countries under degraded conditions of life. This was not a matter for Parliamentary inquiry, but for the Standing Sanitary Commission, which, they might presume, was doing its duty in trying to investigate it. If the statistics and Reports of the Sanitary Commission were to be disregarded, while however grudgingly their Reports must be admitted to have been against the Acts, he could not see the use of any fresh Commission being established to be disregarded again if it contradicted the opinion of those who did not agree with it. The learned scientific advisers who had spoken had not touched the chief question that affected the Contagious Diseases Acts. In India it might be possible, without any kind of moral objection, to have a periodical examination insisted upon of all women engaged in the different cantonments. But he trusted that the only other method of dealing with it—the one on which the whole character of the Acts depended in the countries of Europe—would never be sanctioned. But it is ordained in the second Act attached to the late Dispatch from the India Office, in which it was the duty of soldiers to denounce those who had communicated disease. This evening's Debate had removed the question from India to England. In England there is no machinery possible but police control. A revival of the system of denunciation would revolt the English mind. They had sufficient evidence of the intolerable servitude which was entailed by the foreign system of licensed prostitution. They knew the hopeless and defenceless condition of the young women, and the magisterial corruption which had been brought before them as supporting the police abroad in the different methods of blackmail and persecution. Life would not be tolerable to women of the working classes under such espionage. Espionage itself was a thing of which our country had happily been free, and he trusted nothing would be established in the nature of that terrible engine of oppression involved in the system of denunciation. This was the real objection to the Acts being revived. He knew of no other way in which they were enforced in any country in which they existed. So he appealed strongly against any revival of the Acts themselves, while he would gladly give his hearty co-operation to any reasonable methods of hygienic or sanitary reform.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, the action of the military authorities has been so frequently referred to during this Debate that I think your Lordships will expect that I should say one or two words as to the manner in which the War Department regards the proposal contained in the Secretary of State's Dispatch. My Lords, we entirely accept the policy of that Dispatch, and we believe that policy is applicable to the British Army not only in India, but in whatever part of the Empire it may be found. Lord Lister, in his very weighty speech just now, expressed the opinion that the new cantonment rules which might be issued under these instructions might possibly not go far enough to be effectual. That may, possibly, be the case, but I am able to tell him that similar rules were enforced not long ago in India, and those best able to judge anticipated for them a success which, of course, they were not permitted to achieve because they were repealed within a few months of the date when they were first enacted. It should be remembered that these rules rely not only on the compulsory power of detaining in hospital all women who have been ascertained to be diseased, but upon the prospect that these poor creatures, when they find hospitals are open for them and that in those hospitals they are kindly and humanely treated, will gladly, of their own accord, go into hospital rather than submit to the other alternative, which, as you are aware, is that of expulsion from the cantonments. But, my Lords, whether I am right or wrong as to this, I would venture to insist that in cases of this kind, profiting by our former experience of the question, we shall be wise if we lay ourselves open to the charge of lagging a little behind public opinion, rather than to the charge of going far ahead of it. ["Hear, hear!"] I do not propose to detain you with any reference, or, at any rate, any lengthened reference to the statistics which have been brought forward. My Lords, in this matter statistics may be used for two purposes. They may be used in order to show that the Acts to which reference has been made were or were not successful in achieving the desired object; or, again, they may be used merely for the purpose of showing that the existing situation is so serious as urgently to demand effectual action on the part of the Government. With regard to the statistics as far as they illustrate the effect of the now repealed Acts and regulations, I readily admit that they require reading with great care and discrimination before anyone can say with absolute confidence that the case is proved by the figures; because, as has been said, the case is greatly complicated by the fact that the conditions of service in India have been greatly varied by the introduction of short service, which obviously renders the soldiers of the Army much more liable to this great danger. There is another complication in the statistical view of the case, which is this—that from time to time these diseases are reclassified by the medical authorities, and I have always found in all medical statistics persons are apt to be misled owing to the fact that the same ailment was described at different times under different names. Then, as Lord Roberts told you, there is a question whether these Acts were always administered in a proper and intelligent manner, or whether, as he evidently supposed, they were frequently given effect to in a very fitful and blundering fashion. I say, therefore, I have no wish to insist too much on the value of statistics in order to show the efficacy of the repealed Acts. But when we come to the value of the figures as denoting the growth and serious condition of things in the British Army, I think we may say without hesitation that the case is an overwhelming one. [Cheers.] It appears not to be disputed that out of a small Army of 70,000 soldiers in India in the year 1894, no less than 20,000 had been affected by the graver form of this disease; nor is it denied that of the whole of that force only a minority of 37 per cent. had been altogether free from disease of one kind or another. These figures appear to me to constitute an overwhelming case. ["Hear, hear!"] I have often heard complaint that the interests of the Army at home were subordinated to the interests of the Army in India. My Lords, we bear as cheerfully as we can the sacrifice which the home Army is called upon to make for the sake of the Indian Army, but I think we have a right to say it is not part of the contract that the men whom we land in India, and who are the very flower of the British Army, should, owing to our own neglect, come back to us withered and tainted by this horrible complaint. We haggle with the Treasury over the price of two or three battalions; but here is an enemy which literally decimates the British Army, and places men hors de combat, not by hundreds, but by thousands. And the case is equally serious when we come to consider the injury sustained by the civil population. We have it here that of the 13,000 men who year by year come back to this country from India only about 5,000 are altogether clean and free from diseases of this kind. There is another point which has, I think, been fairly established, and that is that the present condition of the law in India has become intolerable. I am tempted to say that the present condition of these regulations in India — regulations which, as your Lordships have heard, treat this particular form of disease as privileged, as a form of disease not to be treated as other infectious and contagious diseases are— I am tempted to say that the condition of these regulations is a rather instructive example of the results of dealing with important questions of this kind precipitately and under the influence of strong emotion or excitement. ["Hear, hear!"] I hope we shall avoid that error upon the present occasion. Your Lordships probably recollect the history of this case. Some ten years ago the circular to which the right rev. Prelate referred—a most improperly-worded and unfortunate circular—came to light. A great shock was given to the public mind, and thereupon a Resolution of the House of Commons was passed. That Resolution was peremptory in its terms, but very vague in its language. It was virtually an Act of Parliament, although it underwent none of that close discussion and detailed examination which under the practice of Parliament all Acts undergo. The Government of India endeavoured loyally to give effect to that Resolution, but subsequent inquiries disclosed the fact that in many districts the local military authorities, instead of keeping carefully within the terms of the instructions which had been issued to them, to some extent disregarded those instructions. There was another outbreak of indignation at the thought that the rules which had been agreed upon, after careful discussion, between the India Office and the Government of India should be thrown into the waste-paper basket, and an Act was imposed upon Lord Elgin's Government—an Act which was, to the best of my belief, either mischievous or useless, and which was greatly resented by the unofficial members of Lord Elgin's Council. I mention these things, not because I have any desire to rake up old controversies—we can occupy ourselves in a better way than that—but because I trust we shall avoid in the future the kind of mistakes which we have committed in the past. I certainly do not impute to those who differ from us anything but the most absolute honesty and sincerity of purpose. Nor, on the other hand, can I find the heart to blame very seriously those unfortunate soldiers who, desiring to shield their men from the consequences of this terrible scourge, found themselves with one foot across the very badly defined frontier line which Parliament had laid down for their guidance. ["Hear, hear!"] The noble Earl who brought this matter forward suggested to your Lordships that further inquiry might be desirable. For my part I have heard with great pleasure the statement made by successive speakers that there is no occasion for such inquiry, and I trust that it will not be pressed for. As far as I am able to judge, except among a few extreme partisans, there is no difference of opinion either as to the facts or as to the direction in which we should look for a remedy. As to the state of the case outside India, there is already in the published statistics a very sufficient account of the health of the troops at the different colonial stations. The figures show that British troops suffer more than the troops of any foreign country. They also show, I think, that Lord Playfair was correct in his statement that there must be something radically wrong in the manner in which this question is dealt with in the stations abroad occupied by British troops, as compared with foreign stations occupied by the troops of other countries. I will mention two cases. At Singapore compulsory examination was abolished on January 1, 1888, and immediately afterwards 200 women left the Lock hospital in a state of disease. An enormous increase in the admission rate and "constantly sick" rate immediately commenced and has gone on ever since. The rates of admission have about trebled since 1887. For example, in 1885, 1886, and 1887 the rates were 131, 134, and 197 per 1,000; since then they have varied from 400 to 600 per 1,000. The other case, to which I will refer by way of contrast, is the case of Malta. There, owing to the strenuous opposition of the local Press and non-official members of the Council of Government, the repealing ordinance was rejected and a local Act remains in force. The admission and "constantly sick" rates have shown remarkable fluctuations, but in the last few years have averaged less than one-half of the rates at Gibraltar, the average of admissions being about 150 per 1,000. With regard to the home Army we have figures for the 14 stations where the Acts were in force, and comparing these figures with the statistics relating to 14 other large stations they again appear to show conclusively that, whereas while the Acts were in force the protected stations enjoyed comparative immunity from these diseases, after the repeal of the Acts the non-protected and the protected stations became very much on a par. I have heard the suggestion that the practice followed in foreign countries might be inquired into. I doubt very much whether any inquiry into the manner in which these questions are dealt with in foreign countries would be of great advantage to us. The comparative immunity enjoyed by the armies of foreign countries is, of course, notorious; but so is the fact that foreign armies differ in many essential particulars from the British Army, and also the fact that foreign Governments are allowed to do many things which the Government of this country would never be permitted to do. I cannot see that any comparison between an army recruited by voluntary enlistment and a conscript army, between an army recruited entirely from many different classes of society and an army which is recruited entirely from one class of society—and that a class in which you cannot expect to find the highest level of education or the greatest self-restraint—I cannot bring myself to believe that such a comparison would really be very instructive. ["Hear, hear!"] I entirely agree with what was said by the right rev. Prelate when he told the House that he trusted that in this country we should never introduce a system lending itself to these practices of police espionage and police restraint, which may perhaps be tolerated abroad, but which, I am convinced, the people of this country would never tolerate. I would prefer to consider what is practicable here—given the conditions of our Army and the conditions of British society—rather than take a leaf out of the book of any foreign country. With regard to the Dispatch of the Secretary of State, I hope your Lordships will observe that we do not by any means limit our proposals to the mere re-enactment of these cantonment rules. The Dispatch indicates very clearly the directions in which other remedies may possibly be found. Let me in particular call attention to the suggestion that a larger measure of control may be desirable over the disorderly population which frequent not only the cantonments themselves, but the country immediately adjoining cantonments. I have always heard it said; and I believe with truth, that many of the apparently unaccountable outbreaks of this disease at certain stations in India have been due not to the intercourse of the men with the women ordinarily dwelling in the cantonments, but with vagrant, nomad people who have been hanging about the rough ground often to be found outside the limits of the station, and who in many cases have beyond all question been the means of introducing disease of the most dangerous kind into the cantonments. I am also not without suspicion that even in this country a little more vigilance might be usefully exercised over the persons who frequent barracks, and also perhaps over some of the lower public houses and other places frequented by soldiers. But that is a matter as to which I am not yet prepared to make a positive statement. As to our dealings with the soldier himself, it has been pressed upon us by more than one speaker that we should deal equally with the two sexes. That is, so far as the limits of possibility allow it, the principle upon which the proposed practice is founded. We consider that it is our duty to prevent any person who is notoriously diseased, from continuing to spread that disease, and as a matter of fact, the soldier, if he conceals the fact that he is suffering from disease of this kind, is detained in hospital until he has recovered his health. A suggestion was made by his Royal Highness and another speaker that we should do well to revert to the old practice of periodically examining the men. ["Hear, hear!"] I have discussed that proposal with many high authorities, and I am bound to tell your Lordships that the conclusion to which I am disposed to arrive is that this practice of regular inspection did not produce the desired effect, and that it was, on the contrary, regarded, and rightly regarded, by the men as a brutalising and degrading practice. It is a practice which has gradually disappeared, and I confess that I should be extremely sorry to see it reintroduced. I need not dwell on the suggestion in the Dispatch that no pains should be spared in order to increase the comfort and decency of the soldier's life in barracks. As to that there is no difference of opinion. Large sums of money have been spent in India, in some measure due to the personal influence of Lord Roberts, on regimental institutes; and his Royal Highness is aware that there has been a very large expenditure at home on recreation establishments in which the men are given every facility for interesting and amusing themselves in the hope that these influences may tempt them away from the low associations in the midst of which they so often contract these diseases. I cannot resume my place without saying a word in reply to the moving appeal made on Friday to your Lordships by the most reverend Prelate. The most reverend Prelate earnestly entreated us to approach this question not merely from the standpoint of the health and the fighting efficiency of the troops, but from the higher standpoint of religion and morality. The most reverend Prelate suggested, I think, that there was a time when the military authorities cared only for the effect of immoral living on the efficiency of the men intrusted to them, that they were indifferent to immorality in itself, if they did not actually encourage it. I doubt whether there has ever been a time when you would have found an English commanding officer so cynical as to tell you that, provided his men were sound in wind and limb and able to turn out in an efficient condition for service in the field, it was a matter of indifference to him whether in their private life they were the greatest ruffians and blackguards in the world. But this I can certainly say, that at the present time there is the strongest possible feeling among the commanding officers that all pains should be taken to raise the moral tone of the men for whom they are responsible. ["Hear, hear!"] I cannot resist bringing to your Lordships' notice one little piece of evidence in confirmation of what I have said, upon which I came almost by accident, and which I need not say was not provided with any idea that this discussion was to take place. I hold in may hand a memorandum recently issued by the general officer in command of the troops in Cape Colony. This is what General Goodenough writes:—

> "Sensual indulgence is a breach of the law of every religion. It is also a violation of the natural laws conducing to health. . . . It seems the clear duty of commanders in every grade to lead men to a mode of life which will enhance their self-respect and keep them from physical deterioration; and it is to be believed that, among other means, advice, guidance, and a certain amount of plain speaking, which is not derogatory and need not degenerate into coarseness, will undoubtedly have their effect in inducing by degrees a better state of things than now prevails. The General therefore wishes to enlist the aid of commanding officers and of all under them in the endeavour to raise the tone of feeling and opinion in the several commands through the exercise of this advice, guidance, and plain speaking."

["Hear, hear!"] Those views are, I believe, the views entertained by every thoughtful commanding officer in the Army. Although it is idle to suppose that we can expect all these young soldiers shall lead immaculate lives, I do sincerely hope that the result of efforts like these will be, after a while, distinctly to raise the tone of the private soldier in the British Army. Working on these lines, and supported, as I trust we shall be, by both sides in this discussion, I hope we shall be able to mitigate in some way the cruel suffering which the unchecked course of these terrible diseases have brought upon both the military and the civil population of these islands. [Cheers.]

*The Earl of KIMBERLEY: I was extremely glad to hear the noble Marquess begin his observations by saying that it was desirable to proceed in this matter with caution; and he referred in support of that view to the history of these enactments during the past few years. It so happened that it unfortunately fell to my lot when I was Secretary of State for India to deal with the then state of the law in India. The noble Marquess referred to the Resolution passed by the House of Commons in 1888; and he said that it was not very precise. I am sorry to say that it seems to me to have been only too precise. The words of the Resolution are:—

> "Any mere suppression of measures for compulsory examination of women, or for lessening and regulating prostitution in India is insufficient, and the legislation which enjoins, authorises, or permits such measures ought to be repealed."

That is a very distinct Resolution indeed, and so it must have been felt by the noble Viscount (Lord Cross), because he issued peremptory instructions that the terms of this Resolution should be conformed to by the Government of India. When I returned to the India Office there was a strong remonstrance put before the Government against the state of things then prevailing in India; and it was stated that, although these instructions had been given, they had not been fully carried into effect. I felt myself then simply bound by the Resolution of the House of Commons and the instructions which had been given. It was perfectly idle to suppose that we as a Government could have procured a reversal of that Resolution. In point of fact, therefore, it remained binding upon us. It was peculiarly distasteful to me to have to deal with the matter, because I was always in principle in favour of stringent measures for the prevention of this horrible disease. But I conceived that I had no alternative except to loyally see that the Resolution of the House of Commons, adopted as it had been by the Government, should be carried into effect. We made an inquiry, and the result was to show that the instructions given by the noble Viscount had not been carried into effect. I was greatly impressed by the fact that Lord Roberts, who naturally felt a great desire that measures should be taken effectively for repressing the disease, came to the conclusion that to a certain extent the instructions had not been followed. That was the state of things which led to the repeal of the regulations. I must confess there was one circumstance which diminished our regret, and it was the uncertainty which certainly existed as to whether the original regulations had been really successful. I do not base that on any view of my own, but upon the best authority which could possibly be quoted on the subject—namely, the Army Sanitary Commission. This Commission is a body with ample means of knowing the state of health of the Army, and is a most competent body to advise on all these subjects. In their memorandum recently laid before Parliament they say:—

> "It may at once be granted that during the years when prostitution in cantonments was to some extent placed under restriction, a lessening of venereal disease amongst the troops did not come up to what had been expected."

And then follows this important sentence:—

> "In fact, we pronounced the efforts to protect the men by the measures introduced for this purpose to have been a failure."

That was what I had before me; and naturally, seeing what had been resolved by Parliament and the extreme hostility shown to the Acts, and having a Report of this kind before me, I felt much less compunction in taking the course which I felt it my duty to take as Secretary of State. But this is not a question of arguing whether the regulations were or were not sufficient for the purpose; what we have before us is the simple fact that there is a frightful amount of disease in the Army, and that it is our absolute duty to take any measures we can devise for diminishing such disease. That is the case before us, and it is not at all profitable to argue as to the statistics of the past except in this way—that we must not shut our eyes to the fact that it is not merely good intentions that are wanted, but that measures effective for the purpose must be devised. ["Hear, hear!"] I cannot help thinking, notwithstanding what we have heard from the medical authorities, that there is a real, substantial, inherent difficulty in really devising these effective measures. We must not be disappointed, therefore, if the steps now taken by the Government should not have all the effect which we should desire. If upon experience that should prove to be the case, I trust we shall not hesitate to take measures still more stringent. [Cheers.] This is not a matter which we can afford to trifle with. Differing from those who have conscientiously opposed this measure, I hold the opinion that, not only in the interests of the health of the Army and of the civil population, but even of morality itself, it is our duty to endeavour to diminish this evil, because it cannot be moral to leave a terrible disease to ravage a population upon any principle or pretext whatever if you have any means to repress it. [Cheers.] Possibly we may have to adopt means extremely distasteful, and which one would rather not have recourse to; but you have to choose between two things—either to allow the mischief to continue or to adopt whatever measures are found absolutely necessary in order to diminish, though it may not be possible entirely to prevent, it. The facts repel the view that if you take measures to prevent the disease you remove one of the strongest preventives to vice. As a matter of fact, the disease does not prevent the vice, and therefore the argument, even if you admit it, is worth nothing. The most reverend Prelate insisted on the importance of taking every step to improve the morality of the soldier. Every one will cordially concur with the most reverend Prelate; but do not let us shut our eyes to the fact that the history of mankind proves that by no such means will you produce any great or far-reaching effect. I insist upon that, not from any cynical view, but because you must look facts in the face, and it is no use to imagine that you will by any means of that kind really be able to grapple with the problem. Only one word more. I think all who have heard this most interesting Debate, and who hold the opinions which I imagine are generally held here with regard to the necessity for the prevention of this disease, must have seen with great satisfaction the change of feeling which has come across the country upon the subject. It is a matter, I think, of the greatest moment that you will in this respect carry the country heartily with you. [Cheers.] If the Government proceed cautiously and wisely, and if the Government of India see that nothing is done beyond the actual necessity of the case, I believe that not only will the country support the Government in the measures which it has now taken, and which I heartily hope may be themselves successful, but also in any further measures which they may find indispensable for the object in view. [Cheers.]

*LORD CLARINA, as one of the oldest regimental officers in the House, having had the honour to command a battalion in India as well as in the West Indies, and also one on the home service, felt bound to say a few words. The most reverend Prelate advocated as a means of promoting morality in the Army an increase of married soldiers in a battalion. Presumably the most reverend Prelate would not imagine that if a regiment 1,000 strong were sent to India they could provide them with 1,000 wives and supply transport for a couple of thousand children. [Laughter.] Therefore he looked upon that as an impracticable proposition. Supposing, again, 200 soldiers were allowed to marry in each battalion, what would become of the remaining 800? That plan would have no sensible effect in lessening the ravages of disease. He was amazed to hear it suggested that penal results should fall upon a commanding officer in whose regiment there was a large amount of disease. No body of men were more devoted to their duty than the commanding officers of regiments. He commanded two different battalions during his considerable service in India, and he could only say that everything in the power of a commanding officer had not only been done of late during the time Lord Roberts was in command, but that the same anxiety was shown by an equally gallant and able soldier, the late Lord Strathnairn. [Cheers.] Having regard to all that was done for the soldier in the way of libraries and the provision of reading-rooms and every sort of game, instruction in trades, and the system of regimental gardens, he was at a loss to know how moral suasion could be carried out more than had been done by officers commanding battalions. He felt convinced, having carefully read over the Dispatch of the Secretary of State, that the measures proposed by the Government would be utterly futile. He agreed with Lord Roberts as to the disease being frequently contracted by the coolie-women employed in carrying out works at the barracks. These women did the work of labourers in England, and it would be a great hardship to prohibit their employment. But there was no reason why they should not be numbered, like the policemen and cabmen in this country. The native policemen attached to the regiment would know the women who misconducted themselves, and with such women compulsory inspection should be enforced. Merely to expel them would be ineffectual, because the men would follow them. It was impossible to prevent soldiers from indulging the strongest instinct of human nature. Here was a terrible scourge which afflicted not only the evil-doer, but a great number of innocent women and children; and to public opinion the evil had been made so thoroughly clear, that he had great hopes the opposition to measures which would stamp out the disease would cease. He only hoped that the clergy would follow the lead of the Primate, who so fully recognised the necessity of dealing with the question, rather than that of the right reverend Prelate to whom the House had listened that evening.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said that he hoped the Debate might be of great service in having elicited the opinions of the very highest authorities. The Archbishop of Canterbury had commented on the fact that he had not devoted very much time to the moral remedies for the case. He had, indeed, confined himself mainly to the means of satisfying the pressing needs of the case, but he by no means undervalued the effect of moral suasion, and he hoped that everything would be done to distract the minds of the soldiers and improve the moral tone. But, except the superficial matters, human nature changed very slowly, while the ravages of this disease were rapid; and he was deeply impressed with the necessity for taking effective hygienic measures to deal with the pressing necessities of the question. He did not think, judging from the admirable speech of the most reverend Prelate, that, although they might differ as to the relative potency of various remedies, there was any difference of an essential kind between them. Her Majesty's Government did not think such an inquiry as he had asked for would be wise; and therefore he should withdraw his Resolution, though with considerable reluctance. The reasons given by the Under Secretary for India in opposition to the inquiry appeared to him the strongest reasons in favour of the inquiry. The noble Earl had said that information as to the effects of the disease on the native population here could be obtained from women's hospitals, workhouse infirmaries, homes for children, and the churchyards of the country. But such sources of information were not readily available for the great bulk of the public. The noble Earl added that there were five large volumes issued by the Colonial Office, and that the amount of literature on the subject was overwhelming. That was why such an inquiry as he suggested was desirable. The Report of the Departmental Committee was contained in some 30 pages, cost 6½d., contained an immense amount of valuable information, and would be of enormous value in forming public opinion. What he should have liked to see was an inquiry resulting in a similar Report extended over a larger area; and he hoped that would be done some day. Lord Playfair had said that he wished public opinion knew the effect which hygienic measures had in preventing the disease. That was just the hardest thing for the public to learn at present. But as Her Majesty's Government thought that an inquiry might lead to the idea that there should be delay pending its completion, and as they were convinced that the time for action had come, he should withdraw his Resolution, for the last thing he wished to do was to defer effective action. [Cheers.]

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 1) BILL.

Read a Second time.

Mr. D. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) rose to move:—

> "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to divide the Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill into two Bills, one comprising the Anstruther, Deal, Hunstanton, and St. Andrew's Pier and Harbour Orders, the other comprising the Killala Pier Order, and to Report them separately to the House."

He said it was exceeding difficult for hon. Members to deal with Provisional Order Bills of this kind which related to so many different places.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. C. T. Ritchie, Croydon) said that it might save the hon. Member's time if he at once stated that he had no objection to the hon. Member's Instruction.

Mr. CRILLY moved his Instruction.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

HERRINGS (IMPORTED).

Sir CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate (1) whether his attention has been called to the statement that quantities of herrings imported from abroad are being branded as Loch Fyne herrings and sold under that denomination in the Scottish markets; and (2) whether he is aware that, on a complaint that East Coast herrings were being so branded, the Scottish Fishery Board took steps to prevent the fraudulent use of the brand in their case; if so, whether its fraudulent use in the case of foreign herrings can be prevented?

*The LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. Graham Murray, Buteshire): I am informed by the Fishery Board that they have communicated with their Officers at the leading fishery stations on the Scottish coasts, including Glasgow, and these officials all report that they have no knowledge of any such practice as that stated in the first part of the hon. Member's Question. I am aware of the case referred to in the second part of the Question.

LETTERS FOR HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS.

Mr. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that H.M.S. Algerine, which left England on 27th February last for the China Station, had, up to the 17th April, received only three mails, one at Gibraltar, one at Malta, and one at Aden, but none at Port Said, none at Suez, and none at Colombo; whether there has been any material departure from the original programme of dates for the arrival at and departure from the various ports of this vessel; and, if not, whether he can explain why the Post Office authorities have failed to dispatch her mails so as to catch her at the ports named; and, whether greater care will be taken to insure the due forwarding of letters for Her Majesty's ships on the various foreign stations so as to ensure their receipt by the crews without unnecessary delay?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The mails for H.M.S. Algerine were forwarded strictly in accordance with the information received from the Admiralty. On the 27th and 28th of February the ship's bags were dispatched to Gibraltar; after the 28th of February and up to the 10th of March they were sent to Malta; after the 10th and up to the 19th of March they were sent to Aden, and afterwards to Singapore. No request was made by the Admiralty for mails to be sent to this ship at Port Said, Suez, or Colombo. Every care is taken by the Post Office to ensure the due forwarding of correspondence for Her Majesty's ships. Mails were advisedly not sent to Port Said or Suez for Algerine, on account of the doubt of their catching the ship at those ports. Colombo was omitted through a regrettable oversight, which occurred at the Admiralty in making the very large number of alterations in the mail list, which are of daily occurrence, and frequently of considerable intricacy. I understand, however, that complaints of the non-receipt of letters by Her Majesty's ships in all parts of the world, are of rare occurrence.

WATER SUPPLY (LONDON).

MR. HARRY SAMUEL (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Royal Commission on the Water Supply of London has yet commenced its inquiry; if not, whether he can state what are the reasons for the delay, and when it is expected the inquiry will begin?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The Royal warrant appointing the Commissioners was received on May 6, but little more than a week ago. The question as to the provision of accommodation for the Commission has not yet been settled, but when the preliminary arrangements are made a meeting of the Committee will be held on an early day.

MR. T. LOUGH (Islington, W.) asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could give any information as to the details of the Bill for the benefit of the London consumers.

LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

MR. HARRY SAMUEL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the satisfactory progress in public business, he is now in a position to fix the date when he will introduce the Bill for the benefit of the water consumers of the Metropolis?

MR. CHAPLIN: I have not had an opportunity of discussing the matter with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, and I cannot say the exact date when the Bill will be introduced; but it will be introduced shortly.

SUNKEN WRECKS (PLYMOUTH FISHING GROUND).

MR. CHARLES HARRISON (Plymouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the serious loss and damage accruing to the fishing industry from the sunken wrecks on the fishing ground between the Eddystone and Start Point; and whether he will cause such wrecks to be broken up or destroyed, or consult with the Admiralty as to their removal?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): My attention has from time to time been called to the loss and damage caused to the fishing industry from sunken wrecks in the neighbourhood of the Eddystone and Start Point. The Board of Trade have no statutory powers nor any funds at their disposal to enable them to undertake the removal or destruction of such wrecks.

MR. HARRISON asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would not consult the Admiralty in order to ascertain whether they could not do something in the matter?

MR. RITCHIE: I do not know what advantage would be derived from our taking that course, because it is quite certain that the Admiralty are no better off than we are in the matter. They have neither power to interfere nor funds to pay the expenses any more than we have.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES asked whether the expenses might not be defrayed by a grant made from the Trinity House Mercantile Marine Fund?

MR. RITCHIE: I am not sure, but I may point out to the hon. Gentleman that if a Government Department were to take upon themselves the responsibility for clearing the bottom of the sea, and were to draw upon the Mercantile Marine Fund for the expense of doing so, there would not be much of that fund left for other purposes.

BRIGADE OF GUARDS (MEDICAL DEPARTMENT).

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Medical Department of the Brigade of Foot Guards is short-handed, and that much difficulty is experienced in filling vacancies in consequence of insecurity of tenure, and the expense of living in London; whether an official application was lately made by the Commanding Officers of the three regiments of Foot Guards for a return to the regimental system; and whether the War Office is prepared to give sympathetic consideration to this request?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): There is at present one vacancy on the Medical Establishment of the Foot Guards. Appointments are made from medical officers who volunteer for the service; and as the appointments are for a fixed term of five years there is no insecurity of tenure. The officers commanding the regiments did recently suggest a return to the old regimental system; but under the existing system no difficulty has hitherto been experienced in finding candidates for the appointments.

LETTERBREEN PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether memorials signed by all creeds and classes have been received by the Irish Government with reference to the election of a clerk for the Petty Sessions district of Letterbreen, County Fermanagh, requesting, on the ground of public convenience, that it shall be a condition that the successful candidate to be elected on the 21st instant shall be required to reside at or near the Court House, in accordance with the usage of other districts and of the Letterbreen district for the past 60 years; and if he is in a position to say that the prayer of the memorial will be acceded to?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): Memorials have been received of the nature indicated in the first paragraph, and other memorials have also been received against the appointment of a resident clerk. The Magistrates are fully acquainted with all the regulations bearing on the subject of the election of a clerk, and I must decline at the present stage to state by anticipation what decision the Government may arrive at.

TELEGRAM (NON-DELIVERY).

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that on the morning of 15th March last a telegram was sent from Bangor by Mr. Roberts, of Aber, near Bangor, to a veterinary surgeon, addressed, Rumsey Williams, Carnarvon, requesting his immediate attendance on account of the illness of Mr. Roberts's mare, was not delivered, but was returned to the sender by post the next day, resulting in a delay of 20 hours in the veterinary surgeon's attendance on the mare, which was a valuable shire mare in foal, and died in consequence; whether he is aware that Mr. Rumsey Williams is the only veterinary surgeon of that name in Carnarvon, and, in fact, the only one besides his own assistant; whether, seeing that letters addressed to him in the same terms as the telegram are frequently delivered, he will explain why this telegram was not delivered; and will steps be taken to prevent the recurrence of such inconvenience and loss to the public?

MR. HANBURY: A telegram to the effect stated in the Question was sent on the 15th March by Mr. Roberts, of Aber. The non-delivery of the telegram was brought to the notice of the Postmaster General by Mr. Roberts, who was informed that, although the address of the telegram was strictly not sufficient for the purposes of delivery, the Postmaster General was of opinion that, in view of the nature of the telegram, special efforts should have been made to get it into the hands of the right person. Mr. Rumsey Williams is the only veterinary surgeon of the name in Carnarvon, but the explanation given by the Postmaster for the non-delivery was that there are several persons of the name in Carnarvon, and that in order to avoid difficulty it is necessary that, unless an abbreviated address has been registered, the full address should be given. The opinion of the Postmaster General was duly conveyed to the Postmaster, and regret was expressed to Mr. Roberts.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHERS' FUND (IRELAND).

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any resolution has been received from the Cavan Teachers' Association protesting against the proposals of the Treasury on the subject of the Irish Teachers' Fund; whether the premiums paid by teachers are to be considerably raised, whilst the age for voluntary retirement is to be also raised, thereby lessening the number of claims on the pension fund; whether the first of first class pensions are to be abolished; and, if so, is he aware that it will absolutely deprive a number of first of first class Cavan teachers of the pensions to which they are lawfully entitled, and on getting which they reckoned; and will he make representations to the Treasury or the Education Commissioners suggesting the withdrawal of these proposals?

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: Resolutions on this subject have been received. The Report of the Committee and the Treasury Minute have been presented, and will be issued immediately. Meanwhile I may state that the premiums will be raised, but not the age for voluntary retirement. Nor will the first class pensions be abolished in the case of any teachers who now subscribe for them.

LAND COMMISSION.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will ask the Irish Land Commissioners to direct the next Court of Sub-Commissioners that sits for the disposal of cases from the Union of Bawnboy to hold their Court in Ballyconnell, where there is a commodious courthouse in which Quarter Sessions are held, and not put witnesses to the expense and trouble of travelling longer distances to the Court?

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners, as well as the Chairmen of the several Sub-Commissions acting in accordance with the special wishes of the Commissioners, always endeavour to fix the places of hearing of fair rent applications to suit the convenience of all parties concerned, but they cannot, at present, undertake in this instance that the Sub-Commission will sit at Ballyconnell.

Mr. J. C. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether his attention has been called to the latest returns of evictions and eviction notices for the quarter ended 31st March 1897, from which it appears that 109 tenants were turned out of their holdings under Section 7 of the Land Law Act 1887, as against 17 under other processes of law, and 959 tenants dispossessed of all rights in their holdings under the same section; and (2) whether the Government, in view of the agricultural depression under which Ireland is now suffering, and in the light of these returns, will consider the propriety of introducing a short Bill repealing said section of the Act of 1887?

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The number of tenants turned out of their holdings under Section 7 of the Act of 1887 during the quarter ending March 31 last was 95, and the number turned out under other processes of law in this period was 17. The number of tenants converted into caretakers by service of ejectment notices under the seventh section during the same quarter was 959. The tenancy being determined by the service of a notice under this enactment, the tenant must redeem before he can apply to have a fair rent fixed. I believe such redemptions are frequent, though statistics of the actual number are not available, and it is incorrect to assume that the tenant in every such case is ultimately dispossessed of all rights in his holding. Moreover, the tenant may sell the tenancy at any time before the expiration of six months from the service of the notice. I may also point out that, whilst the number of tenants actually evicted in the past quarter was 112, the number of holdings retaken by former tenants in the same period was 158. The reply to the second paragraph is in the negative.

Mr. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Have the Government any information at their disposal which would show how many of these cases were those of judicial tenants?

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: No; I do not think we have, Sir.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Land Commission have in many cases adopted the practice in fair rent applications of having the evidence heard and the holding inspected by only one lay Commissioner; when was this change of practice made, and on what principle the cases in which only one lay Commissioner is to act are selected; whether the practice has arisen because of the want of a sufficient number of lay Commissioners; and whether, in view of the important nature of the interests involved, the Land Commission will in future see that the practice of having an inspection by two lay Commissioners is adhered to?

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners have in several instances delegated to a Sub-Commission, consisting of one legal and one lay assistant Commissioner, the hearing of fair rent cases. This practice has been in existence to a limited extent for many years, and it has been extended during the present year. It has been adopted by the Land Commission for the convenience of the dispatch of public business, and I am informed that the cases have not been specially selected. The Land Commission in their discretion intend to continue the practice.

Mr. MAURICE HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the third part of my Question—"whether the practice has arisen because of the want of a sufficient number of lay Commissioners?"

*Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: I think I have answered that part of the Question. No doubt if you increase the number of lay assistant Commissioners a measure of this kind will be less necessary in the interest of the dispatch of public business.

CIVIL SERVICE (SECOND DIVISION CLERKS).

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that in the Second Report of the Ridley Commission (1889) it was recommended that the new entrants to the re-organised Second Division of the Civil Service should be employed upon the lowest class of clerical work; whether the present scale of salaries was founded upon those recommendations; whether, since the issue of that Report, other grades lower than the Second Division and engaged on inferior work have been established; and, if so, whether the character of the duties performed by the Second Division has been accordingly raised; and whether he will grant an inquiry into the nature of the duties of the clerks of the Second Division appointed subsequently to the abovementioned Report under the Order in Council of 21st March 1890?

Mr. HANBURY: The answer to the first paragraph is, Yes; if in clerical work the hon. Member does not include copying. A class of copyists was, of course, contemplated by the Commissioners. The Report of the Commission, it was found, did not provide for a class of work in certain departments of a higher order than copying but not of sufficiently advanced or responsible character to be assigned to clerks of the Second Division, and the class of Statistical Abstractors, who continue the work of the old class of copyists, was created. The result has not been to raise the character of the duties performed by the Second Division. The present scale of the Second Division was fixed subsequently to the Treasury Minute reserving power to appoint abstractors, and in view of its provisions, and in any case all Second Division Clerks entering since that date (10th August 1889) have entered with a knowledge of the conditions of service.

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACTS.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government will appoint a Select Committee to consider the working of the Boiler Explosions Acts (1882 and 1890) with a view of ascertaining whether any further legislation is desirable and practicable for the more effectual prevention of such explosions?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): We are too far advanced, I am afraid, in the Session to be able to hope that a Committee can do much with the inquiry which the hon. Baronet suggests before its close; but if I saw any indications that an inquiry would be generally welcomed in regard both to this subject and also that of the Bill relating to the persons in charge of engines and boilers, to which the House has given a Second Reading, I should be prepared to favourably consider the proposal.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES (IRELAND).

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a memorial from the Midleton (County Cork) Board of Guardians relative to the proposed unequal distribution of the Exchequer grant in aid of the erection of labourers' cottages; and whether he will take steps to comply with the request contained in the memorial?

*MR. GERALD BALFOUR: Memorials have been received from several Boards of Guardians in reference to the distribution of the Exchequer contribution in aid of the erection of labourers' cottages. I am not prepared to introduce further legislation on the subject. The proposed Amendment was considered by the Government when the Act of last year was under consideration, but was not adopted.

WORKMEN (COMPENSATION FOR ACCIDENTS) BILL.

*MR. HENRY BROADHURST (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can inform the House as to what portions of the building trades would come under the protection of the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill; and under what circumstances operatives in the building trade would be excluded from its benefits?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Persons engaged in building works will come under the Bill or not according as steam machinery or the like is or is not used in the construction of the works. The distinction proposed in the Bill is roughly that which exists in the present law between factories and workshops, and further details are, I venture to think, questions for the Committee on the Bill.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the event of the passing, during the present Session, of the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill, the Government will undertake to propose legislation on similar lines in next Session with regard to seamen?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Government quite recognise the importance of the Question raised by the right hon. Baronet, but I should be sorry to give any pledge with regard to the legislation we shall propose next Session.

MR. J. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government will be prepared to extend the Act of 1880 to seamen this Session?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: No, Sir; I do not think we can bring in a second Compensation Bill this Session.

IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. J. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, with the view of providing an earlier morning delivery at Ballyshannon and Bundoran than 8.30 a.m. and 9 a.m. respectively, and a later dispatch than 4 p.m. and 4.25 p.m. from Bundoran and Ballyshannon respectively, the Post Office Department has yet approached the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland, and with what result; whether the inhabitants of Bundoran, Ballyshannon, and the district lying between Bundoran and Bundoran Junction have repeatedly complained of the inadequate mail service afforded them; and what improved service in the direction indicated in the foregoing paragraph the Department now proposes for the district mentioned?

*Mr. HANBURY: The Great Northern Railway Company has been approached with the object of substituting a train service for the present mail car service from Bundoran Junction to Ballyshannon and Bundoran, 35 miles distant from the Junction. The inhabitants have from time to time complained of the present service, but no improvement in the car service is possible under the existing railway time tables; and it is regretted that the very large sum demanded by the railway company for an early morning train from Bundoran Junction to Bundoran precludes the hope of making the desired improvement by means of the train.

Mr. MACNEILL: Is there no means by representation to the Board of Works or otherwise of bringing the railway company to a sense of reason?

Mr. HANBURY: No; I am afraid there is no method of dealing with the railway company under these circumstances.

Mr. RICHARD M. DANE (Fermanagh, N.): Could the right hon. Gentleman say what offer was made by the Postal authorities to the Great Northern Railway Company?

Mr. HANBURY: No, Sir; it would be contrary to the usual practice to state so.

Mr. MACNEILL: Would the right hon. Gentleman suggest a Royal Commission?

STAMP DUTY (IRELAND).

Mr. D. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury how it happens, while the stamp duty imposed upon conveyances in ordinary cases is computed at 10s. per cent., the duty in land purchase cases is not only 10s. per cent. on the purchase money, but 10s. per cent. also on the value of the unpaid instalments calculated up to the end of the 49 years during which the tenant has to make payments; and can anything be done to mitigate this burden upon small tenant purchasers?

Mr. HANBURY: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained in reply to a similar Question put to him on the 16th June 1896, the provisions of the Stamp Act to which the hon. Member refers are not confined to Ireland. They apply equally to the sale of any property subject to the payment of money, whether by way of charge or incumbrance or not, and the treatment of land sold subject to repayment of the Land Commission advance is the same as that of land sold subject to an ordinary mortgage. What is bought is more than the tenant's former tenancy; it is a registered freehold title, subject to a terminable charge in favour of the Land Commission.

ORDNANCE SURVEY (MAYO).

Mr. JOHN DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture (1) if he could state when will the maps of the revised survey of the County of Mayo be all completed and published; (2) of what parts of the County of Mayo will maps be published on the 25-inch scale; (3) whether maps on the 6-inch scale will be also published for the whole county; and (4) will maps of Ireland for the future be in every way brought up to the same standard as the English and Scotch maps?

*The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of AGRICULTURE (Mr. Walter Long, Liverpool, West Derby): The new 25-inch maps of Mayo will be all completed and published in about two years from now. It is not at present practicable to fix a date for the completion of the revised 6-inch maps. Maps on the 25-inch scale will be published for the whole of the county, with the exception of the moorland in the western part. The reply to the third and fourth Questions is in the affirmative.

CRETE.

Mr. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and, if so, what progress has been effected with the arrangements for the departure of the Turkish troops for Crete?

The UNDER SECRETARY of STATE for FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. Curzon, Lancashire, Southport): For the reasons which I named in the Debate of May 7th, it has not yet been found possible to make any arrangements for the withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Crete, but the question has again been brought forward for discussion by the Powers.

LETTERS (OFFICIAL POSTMARKS).

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the clearly printed postmarks on the letters received in this country from New York and Ottawa, compared with the indistinctly printed postmarks on the majority of letters sent from the leading London post offices; whether he is aware of the existence of the Canadian postmarking machine recently invented, which clearly prints the post town, date, and hour of posting; and whether any, and, if so, what steps are now being taken to improve the postmarking of letters in this country?

Mr. HANBURY: The attention of the Postmaster General has been called to the postmarks in question, and to the postmarking machines which are in use to some extent in the United States and Canada; and he has informed the representative of the proprietors that he is prepared to give the system a trial whenever they are in a position to submit a machine for the purpose.

POST CARDS.

Mr. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that receivers of post cards sent from this country are frequently fined three pence, because the words "Post Card" are written and not printed on the address side; and whether he will instruct our representatives attending the Postal Union Congress at Washington to have the practice relaxed so as to abolish this rule, and also the one which forbids the use of the Royal Arms on post cards sent to our colonies or to foreign countries?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is aware that receivers of post cards in this country are fined because the words "post card" are written and not printed on the address side; but, judging from the complaints which are received, such cases are comparatively rare. Various proposals in regard to post cards will be discussed at the Postal Congress at Washington, and the British delegates have been instructed to take up a liberal attitude on these proposals as towards the public.

BOARDS OF GUARDIANS (PUBLIC BILLS).

Sir WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if it is legal for Boards of Guardians to expend any of their funds in opposing public Bills which are before Parliament; and, if it is the case that the Local Government Board has sanctioned payments by certain Boards of Guardians to the Rating and Assessing Authorities' Defence Association, whose object, as stated in a circular issued under its authority, is to watch all movements connected with any Rating of Machinery Bill, and to take such action as will tend to its defeat in Parliament; and, if so, under what statutory authority has such sanction been given, seeing that in the case of other Boards of Guardians subscribing to the same association the district auditors have disallowed these payments on the ground that they were contrary to law?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am advised that expenditure by a Board of Guardians in opposing a public Bill by which they would be affected would not necessarily be illegal, but all the circumstances, including the nature of the expenditure, would have to be considered before a definite opinion could be expressed as regards any particular case. The Board have, in some instances, sanctioned payments of the kind referred to in the second paragraph of the Question, where application has been made to them for the purpose after the expenditure has been incurred and with a view to obviating a difficulty at the audit. The sanction has been given under the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887. They have, however, of late thought it right in giving the sanction to couple with it an intimation that they would not be prepared again to sanction expenditure of this kind.

CHITRAL MEDAL.

Mr. T. R. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War when the Chitral medal will be issued, and what is the cause of the delay?

The SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Lord George Hamilton, Middlesex, Ealing): The Chitral medal has been struck and has for some time past been in course of distribution in India. The cause of the delay in its issue was, as I explained in this House on the 2nd of February last, the decision to strike a new medal, instead of adding a clasp to the existing frontier medal which involved the selection and execution of a new design.

DELIVERY OF LETTERS.

Mr. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if rural postmen in Ireland whose duties will be increased by the proposed house to house delivery of letters will have their salaries augmented?

Mr. HANBURY: The case of every rural postman in Ireland, or elsewhere, whose duty is increased by the proposed extension of the free delivery will be considered on its merits. The salaries of these men are regulated by scale in accordance with the work performed.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Mr. J. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that several railway companies and other large employers of organised and disciplined labour have announced their intention of celebrating Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee by completely removing and cancelling all adverse reports or records of misconduct now existing against individual members of their staffs; and whether he will follow the same course with respect to the Metropolitan Police, many of whom are denied promotion or privileged duty owing to offences committed many years ago?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I was not aware that such was the intention of any of the railway companies or other large employers; but, however that may be, the adoption of a similar course by me in regard to the Metropolitan Police could only, I am afraid, be prejudicial to the welfare both of the public and the force.

Mr. LOWLES: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he will follow the example set by many large employers of organised and disciplined labour, who have announced their intention of celebrating Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee by cancelling all adverse reports or records of misconduct now existing against individual members of their staffs, by removing all disabilities and hindrances to promotion in every department of the Post Office, consequent upon breaches of discipline or other misconduct on the part of the men, which may have been recorded against them to their prejudice?

Mr. J. L. CAREW (Dublin, College Green): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he will consider the advisability of recommending that all records against the postmen of Dublin and other cities be written out and cancelled on the commemoration of the 60th year of Her Majesty's reign?

Mr. HANBURY: I think it will be convenient if I reply to the Questions of the hon. Member for the Haggerston Division of Shoreditch and the hon. Member for the College Green Division of Dublin together. The Postmaster General is not prepared to adopt the suggestions made by the hon. Members. The discipline records in question are preserved in order that the Department may be in possession of the necessary information respecting the conduct and abilities of its servants, to enable it not merely to mete out punishment and rewards, but to see that unfit men are not promoted to positions of trust, and to prevent the grave injustice which would arise if men of good conduct were not to receive the consideration which they deserve. The records are also necessary for pension purposes.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny) asked whether it was not the fact that on the occasion of the Jubilee in 1887 this was done in the case of the Army and police?

Mr. HANBURY: I can only answer for the Post Office. I cannot answer for the Army and the police.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will say how many sub-postmasters there are on the permanent staff of the Post Office; and whether they will benefit under the improved scheme resulting from the recommendations of the Tweedmouth Committee for Postmasters?

Mr. HANBURY: If by "permanent" the hon. Member means on the establishment and pensionable, there are only about 100 in that position, out of the 19,500 sub-postmasters in the United Kingdom; but they are all "permanent" in the sense that their services can only be dispensed with by the direct decision of the Postmaster General. As a class they do not come under the recommendations of the Tweedmouth Committee relating to head postmasters. There are separate suggestions in the Committee's Report affecting sub-postmasters generally, and these are now under consideration.

DEPORTATION OF PAUPERS.

Mr. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he can state on what grounds the Scotch Office declined to nominate a representative to act on the Committee of Inquiry suggested by the Local Government Board for Ireland regarding the deportation of paupers from Scotland to Ireland?

*The LORD ADVOCATE: There was not any question as to facts. The point is a legal one only, but involving in certain aspects the general question of Poor Law settlement; and the Secretary for Scotland did not think that a Departmental Committee formed as proposed could fairly be invited to pronounce on questions which might affect the whole working of the Poor Law in Scotland.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT (AGE CLAUSE).

Mr. ALBERT SPICER (Monmouth Boroughs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, in view of the strongly expressed opinion of some of Her Majesty's inspectors in recent Reports in favour of raising the leaving age in elementary schools from 11 to 12, could he hold out any hope of passing through Parliament this Session a single Clause Bill to effect the proposed change?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: I am not in a position to hold out any hope to the hon. Gentleman that this question will be dealt with in the course of this Session.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON BILL.

Mr. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea Boroughs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to re-introduce the University of London Bill this Session; and, if so, when?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: The President of the Council informs me that he hopes to introduce a Bill into the House of Lords shortly. There is some reason to expect that the difficulties which prevented it from passing last year will be removed and certain negotiations are going on with that object. I am unable as yet to speak with any certainty on the subject.

DURATION OF SPEECHES (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

Major RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will, without unnecessary delay, consider the possibility of introducing such alteration of procedure as would give effect to the sense of the Resolution passed on Tuesday, 11th May, with reference to the duration of speeches in the House of Commons?

The FIRST LORD of the TREASURY: As far as I understood the terms of the Motion which my hon. Friend carried on Tuesday last, it laid down no limit to the length of speeches delivered in the House; but no doubt the result of that decision shows that the general sense of the House is in favour of curtailing the length of speeches, and there will be a very good opportunity to-night and to-morrow—[laughter]—of ascertaining how far that evidence will be taken to heart. [Laughter.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.), who was received with cheers on his return after indisposition, said: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he proposes to take the Budget discussion on Thursday next?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: Yes, Sir; I hope to take the Budget discussion on Thursday, but I could not put it down as the first Order. The first Order will be the Elementary Education Act (1870) Amendment Bill, which I have some reason to hope will not take long.

In reply to Mr. T. M. HEALY,

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he could not give a pledge to take every stage of the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill before proceeding with the Criminal Evidence Bill. He would, however, give as full notice as he could of the time when the later Bill would be brought on again.

In reply to Sir C. DILKE,

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he believed that the Motion he had on the Paper covered the financial part of the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill. He should move the suspension of the Twelve o'clock Rule tomorrow night, so that the Bill might be got through. It was not his intention to take the finance part of the Bill on Wednesday. He moved:—

"That, whenever the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill is appointed for Tuesday, the House do meet at Three of the clock, and the proceedings on the Bill do have precedence of the Notices of Motions and the other Orders of the Day; and that the said Bill do have precedence on Wednesday, whenever it is appointed for that day."

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said the House might be aware that he had a Motion down with reference to Crown lands as the first Order for To-morrow. He should be glad if To-morrow could be spared for a discussion on a question which had a great interest for Wales.

MR. LEONARD COURTNEY (Bodmin, Cornwall) said he did not rise to criticise or oppose this Motion. He wished merely to ask his right hon. Friend to make some statement as to the Wednesdays after Whitsuntide. There were two or three Bills of private Members which had made progress, and which were now down for days after Whitsuntide. He hoped his right hon. Friend in his Motion did not wish to prevent the possibility of these Bills being dealt with after Whitsuntide.

MR. BRYNMOR JONES pointed out that the greatest interest was taken in Wales with regard to the Welsh Land Bill.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY said he could not give any specific pledge as to the Wednesdays after Whitsuntide, but he quite recognised that the object of the Standing Order was to give a chance to private Bills which had made some progress in the earlier period of the Session; and that the spirit of the Standing Order had been usually translated by successive Leaders of the House into an arrangement by which two Wednesdays would be given for private Members' Bills. He should be very sorry indeed if it was found necessary to depart from that general precedent.

Motion agreed to.

CREWE (REPRESENTATION).

MR. MACNEILL: I wish to ask you, Sir, whether, having regard to recent occurrences in the Crewe Division of Cheshire, there is any method of enforcing the constitutional obligation of an hon. Member of this House to attend the service of the House and to prevent the practical disfranchisement of the constituency which that hon. Member represents?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I think, Sir—

MR. MACNEILL: Oh! no, no! I asked Mr. Speaker, not you. [Laughter.]

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I beg pardon. [Laughter.]

*MR. SPEAKER: I am not aware there is any precedent, at least in modern times, for making an order on an individual Member to attend the House, except for the purpose either of giving evidence before a Committee, or attending upon a Committee, or obeying a previous Order of the House or Committee, or to answer for some alleged breach of privilege or order. I say nothing about the power of the House to make such an Order; but I would point out that it would be a very inconvenient course to make motions with regard to individual Members, because it might lead to retaliatory motions from other parts of the House. [Laughter and "Hear, hear!"]

MR. MACNEILL: Will the First Lord of the Treasury take any means of enforcing the attendance of the hon. Member for Crewe, so that we may have the benefit of his advice?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY: I have a much higher opinion of the services rendered by the hon. Member for Crewe than I have of some other Members who have not been present during the whole Session, and I should certainly not take any exceptional measures with regard to any individual Member. [Cheers.]

COAL MINES REGULATION BILL.

TRUCK ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Second Reading deferred from Thursday 3rd June till Wednesday 30th June.

PENSIONS (OLD AGE) BILL.

Second Reading deferred from Wednesday 26th May till Wednesday 30th June.

ISLE OF MAN (CHURCH BUILDING ACTS) BILL [H.L.].

MOTIONS.

SCHOOL BOARDS' EXPENSES.

Bill to provide for expenses incurred by School Boards in relation to School Board Conferences, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Gorst, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Solicitor General; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Thursday, and to be printed.—[Bill 256.]

POOR LAW.

Bill to amend the law with respect to the borrowing of money by Guardians and Managers of District Schools and Asylums, and to explain the Metropolitan Poor Act of 1867, ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. W. Russell and Mr. Chaplin; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 257.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second time."

*MR. GEOFFREY DRAGE (Derby) proposed to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add instead thereof the words:—

> "no Bill dealing with accidents to workmen will be satisfactory to this House which does not provide for the prevention of accidents as well as for compensation in case of injury."

He said he was well aware of the gravity of the step he was taking. He had been told by private Friends on both sides of the House that no one would stand any chance of being re-elected by an industrial constituency who opposed the principle of the Bill. But he had always opposed the principle of the Measure as injurious to the best interests of the working classes, and had always advocated the principle of the Amendment which he was now submitting. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean referred on the First Reading to the subject of the Congress of Milan. There, in company with MM. Léon Say and Yves Guyot, he opposed to the best of his ability the principle underlying the Bill, and during his candidature for Parliament he opposed it on all occasions as he had done since he had had the honour of a seat in the House. He must run any risk there might be attaching to opposition to the Bill, even if he stood alone. He would do so in the hope, perhaps a very vain hope, that his opposition would ultimately arouse some Member of more Parliamentary knowledge, and greater knowledge of the subject than himself to support him. He firmly believed that the cause which he supported in the Amendment was good, and would, in the long run, prevail. The objects he had in submitting his Amendment to the House were to show that it was possible to provide for prevention as well as compensation, to show that this was not effected by the Government Bill and, lastly, to show that if the Government Bill was passed it would endanger the very existence of the friendly societies and those institutions of self-help and reliance which it had taken so many years to build up. An alternative policy to that laid before the House by the Government was that contained in the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Morpeth. In that Bill provision was made for the complete abolition of the doctrine of common employment. ["Hear, hear!"] Everyone who had any acquaintance with the subject knew that the operation of the doctrine of common employment, even as limited by the Act of 1880, did bitter injustice every day to the working classes. [Opposition cheers.] It was necessary there should be a simplification of procedure. There should, he thought, be a State prosecutor to enforce the law where there was no inspector of mines or factories to do so. Further, in the Government Bill there was no provision for the inclusion of the liability of sub-contractors, there was no provision for increased compensation outside the trades provided for; and, lastly, there was no provision for the better regulation of dangerous and unhealthy trades. According to documents circulated among Members of the House, under the Boilers Explosions Act 1882, of 337 fatal accidents, 232 or 68 per cent. were such as, in the tenour of the Report of the Board of Trade, are preventible. It was quite evident, therefore, that regulations in respect of dangerous and unhealthy trades should be made as would, at any rate, prevent such a state of things as those figures disclosed. Further, the provisions of the alternative Measure he suggested to the House would give full recognition of those friendly societies and mutual societies for which Members on the Ministerial side of the House had always contended. All the specialists whom he had been able to consult since the Bill was introduced had informed him that under the Bill the mutual societies would eventually disappear. He would like to hear from the Home Secretary on what grounds they were to destroy those societies for which they had fought so hard. With regard to the general policy of the Bill, he submitted it was extremely hard to exclude the majority of the trades of the country from what was considered to be justice, until the Government experiment had been tried. In times past the principle of Conservative social legislation had been that protection should be afforded to women and children and the helpless in the first instance, and that adult labour and the well organised labourers should be left to self-help. He suggested that this Bill protected the better organised and richer working men, and left the poorer and weaker men and women and children without protection. He could have wished that in this year of all others when so many people are flocking home from the colonies and foreign countries, they could have found time for discussing a Measure which would do justice to all classes of workers alike. With regard to the question of the prevention of accidents, the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean appealed to him on the First Reading as to the experience in Germany. He found that under the German law, which resembled the Government proposals, there had been an undoubted increase of both serious and trivial accidents, even when every deduction was made for an improved system of notification, and for the fresh industries from time to time brought under the operation of the law. The fact was that, whereas some accidents in Germany might be attributable to the action of the employers, by far the larger number of accidents were attributable to the action of the workmen themselves. There was evidence of increased negligence and malingering on the part of the men. The interval of 13 weeks before which compensation for accident could be claimed in Germany had been called there the high school for simulation. A great American scientific authority, Mr. Graham Brooks, had come to the conclusion that in Germany between 10 to 25 per cent. of the accidents were due to malingering. There were in the House Members who specially represent the working classes, and are closely associated with them. They will be able to say whether or not any malingering is known to trade unions and friendly societies in England; if there were none now he suggested that the Bill of the Government would put a premium upon such conduct, and there was no institution like the visiting committee of friendly societies to check it. In Germany a new race of doctors, who were called cognac doctors, had sprung up, and they made their practice by taking a favourable view of accidents. He would not suggest that such a class of doctors existed in England, or that the workmen in England were malingerers, but he asserted that a Bill such as this would encourage evils of such a kind. Prince Bismarck, who himself carried in Germany similar legislation to this, had since said that such legislation showed an extraordinary psychological ignorance of human nature. Then there were the judicial difficulties with regard to actions for compensation. On the First Reading a well known lawyer, the hon. and learned Member for the Epsom division (Mr. Bucknill) stated that if the Government imagined that by this legislation they would stop litigation they made a great mistake. He (Mr. Drage), on the First Reading showed that, whereas under the German system it was supposed that workmen would obtain a remedy at once, there were last year 38,000 appeals to arbitration committees, 12,000 appeals to Berlin, 2,780 of which were left over from the previous year, so that under this legislation there was all the delay of taxation it was hoped to remove left over from the previous year. He did not like to interrupt the Colonial Secretary when the right hon. Gentleman suggested that the figures were not the most recent, but as a matter of fact, the figures he had received from the courtesy of the head of the Imperial Insurance Office at Berlin were made up to the end of last year, and published in the month of March. In Germany no less than 160,000 decisions had been last year given by local associations in regard to questions of compensation, and he imagined that here there would be applications for compensation in all cases of accident. Let him read what Mr. Graham Brooks, who investigated matters on behalf of America said upon insurance in Germany. That gentleman said:—

> "Almost the most certain thing we can say of these laws is, that they have inspired neither gratitude nor contentment of spirit."

If this Bill were passed they would be able to see whether the numbers increased or not. He now came to the question of expense. The increase of accidents would naturally bring an increase of expense. This last year there had been in England 3,700 fatal, and 47,000 non-fatal accidents. He was informed by those who were more conversant with the question of insurance than he was that premiums would undoubtedly rise many times higher than the figure at which they now stood. There were in that House many large employers of labour who were perfectly capable of answering for themselves as to the immediate effect of such a Measure as this on trade, but there were a large number of small employers in the country who were not represented. It seemed to him that such a class as that would be crushed out. It did seem hard that working men who were struggling to rise in the world should be liable not only for their own negligence and for the negligence of their foremen and the men appointed by them, but also, as they would be under the present Bill, for the negligence and wilful act of the injured man. The result would be that an avenue through which many men had risen to careers of usefulness and fulfilled important positions in the State would be closed to them. As far as he could judge the workmen would have to pay for the whole of the expenditure under this Bill. There were those who were of opinion, and amongst them the late Home Secretary the Member for East Fife, that the money would come out of the workmen's pockets as wage-earners, and there were others who believed that it would come out of their pockets as consumers. If it did not come out of their pockets either as wage-earners or consumers, it would be found by them as taxpayers. His own view was that the highest wages should be paid to a workman straight into his pocket that trade allowed, taking into consideration danger and health; and the Friendly Societies should teach him how to insure himself against negligent conduct for which he himself was responsible. Then there was the question of the administrative side of the Bill. On the First Reading the Colonial Secretary was inclined to flatter the Bill on the ground that it was so short and would be therefore easy to pass. The present Bill was in fact a mere skeleton.

[Opposition cheers.] Anyone acquainted with the details of German legislation or any legislation on the subject must be aware that there must be a whole mass of orders arising out of the scheme submitted to the House. ["Hear, hear!"] It was the boast of English legislation of the last century that they passed in that House detailed laws, so that the House of Commons knew how far it was going, and how its provisions would act. He believed that while, as a result of this Bill, the burden of charity will be the same, while the burden of the poor law was not likely to be diminished but to be increased. Under this law the workman would be discouraged from providing for himself as he had done in the past through his friendly society and his trade union, and when out of work would have no club to fall back on. If the Bill should in any way infringe on trade unions, which especially in the north, were largely benevolent in their character, he ventured to think it would be little short of a public calamity. If any hon. Member who held the view that trade unions should be discouraged would look at their figures, he would discover that last year they spent in unemployed benefit £435,000; on sick and accidents benefit, roughly speaking, £250,000; on superannuation benefit, £125,000; and on funeral benefit, £27,000; while their working expenses were £130,000, and among the wealthiest of the old Unions, those connected with mining, iron, engineering, ship-building, and cognate trades, only 6·7 per cent. of their revenue was spent on disputes. He would suggest that anything which diminished in any way that great work or which diminished the inclination of the working men to subscribe to societies which were doing such a magnificent work as that, must be carefully scrutinised before the House gave its assent. [Opposition cheers.] If, by the action of that House, these unions were turned away from benevolent objects, all the intelligence and ability which were now occupied in developing and maintaining these funds would be turned in the only direction to which it could find vent—in the direction of disputes. As to the influence which the present legislation was likely to have on friendly societies, he was told by the best authorities he could consult that this Bill would undermine, if it did not eventually destroy, the whole of such societies in this country. He was told that the miners and other mutual societies were bound to go, and that, though the great orders would in some cases in the first instance receive a temporary local benefit, when the old generation which had built up these societies had gone, the younger generation would refuse to join because they could get, as they said, out of the pockets of the employers, what they now had to pay into their own friendly societies. It might interest hon. Members who sat for the Home Counties to know that in the opinion of an official of a friendly society, which was widely spread over the Home Counties, this Bill would be absolutely destructive of the interests with which he was connected and all those interests with which he was acquainted. He was told that this society, which was a very important one, would go to the wall. The friendly societies in England had rendered great services to the country. They had invented the best system of social insurance at a time when commercial insurance was still in its infancy. They had recognised the important fact only now become known abroad, that industrial sickness and accident were one, and cannot be separated. As time went on and an actuarial science advanced, they had made enormous sacrifices in order to place their funds on a sound financial footing; they had united all orders of society in social work, and, during the last ten years, they had made the most extraordinary progress. He was confident that should the friendly societies be left alone in their beneficent work the problem which the Government hoped to meet, in so far as compensation went, by their present Bill, would be met by the working classes out of their own pockets by their own self-reliance and self-help alone. The record of the ten chief orders in this country for the last ten years showed that in round numbers their membership had increased from 1,600,000 to 2,200,000; that their income had increased from £2,500,000 to £3,500,000; that their benefits paid out had increased from £1,600,000 to £2,400,000; and that their accumulated funds had increased from £11,000,000 to £16,700,000. These societies were doing a great work which this Bill would undermine and destroy, and he asked the House whether it was desirable that the efforts of these men should be in any way undermined? These societies had not only solved the most difficult of social problems, but they had taught the working classes a knowledge of business and public affairs which the working classes in no other country possessed. Lastly, they formed a bond by which the whole country was bound together. They had their branches in the Colonies and in the United States, and if on no other ground than that of the bond which they formed with the English-speaking races, he submitted to the House that any Bill which in any way infringed their privileges or diminished their strength should be carefully scrutinised, and if there was any doubt on the matter it should be rejected by the House. There was the question of social peace. They had been told that this Bill would promote social peace, but if there was any argument to be drawn from the experience of Germany it was that it would promote social strife. He had, by the courtesy of the German Imperial Parliament, been furnished with a copy of their last Debates, and he should like to read to the House the statement of the chief representative of the working classes on this subject. Dr. Grillenberger said:—

> "If these laws (the insurance laws) were so constituted as to be suitable for promoting content among the working classes, no incitement would be of any avail to produce discontent. But you see from the facts as they are placed before you to-day that these laws are not in any way calculated to produce content, but precisely amongst those who are, unfortunately obliged to come in contact with these laws the discontent is even greater than it ever was."

In the face of these facts, he thought it was clear that while, as he had shown, the Government Bill would increase accidents, diminish wages, and endanger the friendly societies, it would hold out no prospect of promoting better relations between employer and employed. The fact was that the working classes in England had now before them the choice of Hercules. On the one side there were those who supported the Government, offering them by way of dole what they had hitherto provided for themselves. On the other hand were those, if any there were who agreed with him, who pointed to the hard and thorny path of self-reliance, self-denial, and self-sacrifice, by which the working classes had solved these great social problems in the past, and he for one exhorted the present generation to hand down to their successors, undiminished, the great institution they had inherited. He only hoped the country and the working classes would have time given them to appreciate what was at stake before the Bill was passed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the interesting speech he recently delivered, summarising the progress of the country in the last 60 years had, he ventured to think, lost sight of a most important factor. He did not take into account the immense advance that had been made during Her Majesty's reign by these self-governing societies, and the great services they had rendered. These societies had made possible, for the first time in the history of the world, the combination between democracy and empire, between liberty and loyalty; and they alone had made the combination possible. In submitting the Motion he had brought before the House, he humbly ventured to ask the House to consider the facts he brought to their notice. He asked them to take into consideration the Bill proposed by the hon. Member for Morpeth as a Bill which would do justice to all classes alike—a Bill which, if passed, would add fresh lustre to the closing years of Her Majesty's reign, as well as to the country they all loved so well.

Sir F. S. POWELL (Wigan) seconded the Amendment.

Mr. EMERSON BAINBRIDGE (Lincoln, Gainsborough) said he had come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that the Bill now before the House was the most important Measure brought before the Parliament for many years. It was a Measure of such a revolutionary and far-reaching character, that only those who had studied it closely or were largely affected by its provisions were likely to have grasped its real character. The labour a working man could apply with his hands being the only capital he possessed, any enactment which would provide him with the means of maintenance when incapacitated by an accident, or which would give to his family some means of support after his death by accident or otherwise, must appeal to the sympathies and receive the support of every Member of that House if it was based upon proper principles. At first sight this Bill seemed to go a long way in that direction; but he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Colonies when he said that many of the Members who spoke had not "a correct appreciation of the Bill." He wished to support any Measure which would give every working man in this country the assurance that he would be provided for in case of accident, but he believed that this particular Bill was against the best interests of the working classes, would be a death blow to the large and prosperous friendly societies promoted by workmen, would have the effect of throwing a large number of old workmen out of employment, and thus throw a special burden on the rates, would put an unfair burden on employers, and was likely to seriously damage the trade of the country. In summarising the objections to the Bill he had omitted to mention one point which was of great importance, that was the limited area to which it was intended to apply. He thought the Government would find that the concensus of opinion was in favour of making it apply to every workman and every workwoman of every class throughout the Kingdom; and on this point he should just like to say one word as to the agricultural class. The exclusion of this class from the Bill had been upheld by some sections of the Press, on the ground that a small farmer if he had to pay for the death of or injury to one of his workmen would be ruined. He should be able to show later on that this argument would extend to other trades included in the Bill, but there was a complete answer to it. Assuming that the Bill in one form or another became law, it would be the duty of every employer, and especially those who, like the small farmer could not personally bear the brunt of a fatal accident, to insure. If the liabilities under the Bill were reduced, as he should suggest later on, the premium for insurance ought not to be serious, if it were serious that, of course, would be a strong argument against the Bill itself. The special points he wished to mention were:—(1) The effect of the Bill on existing Friendly Societies, and Sick and Accident Funds; (2) The bearing of the proposed high compensation on malingering; (3) The blow which the Bill is likely to strike at one of the most important industries in the Kingdom. With regard to the Friendly Societies, for many years nearly all the trades referred to in the Bill had been supported by these societies, which, managed by the workmen themselves, had kept the men while off work whether from sickness of from accident. It had been said that there was a demand for the Bill, but he was not aware that there was a demand for it in any quarter. It was suggested that the case of Germany was some reason for making a change. He would like to point out that there was a great difference between the law of insurance existing in that country and the law as proposed in this Bill. In Germany the workman during the first 13 weeks of incapacitation from work was supported by a fund, nearly one-half of which was contributed by the workmen themselves, and it was only after the thirteenth week that he was supported either by the State or by the employer. Under this Bill the employer alone would maintain the man after the end of the second week. Very few Members of the House, probably, realised what this meant. He had looked into the figures relating to the large mining districts of Lancashire and Cheshire for the five years ending December 31st, 1896. In that period there were 49,000 cases of relief, and no less than 46,000 of those cases were finished within the 13 weeks. In other words, had the German law prevailed in that district the men would have subscribed in 46,000 cases, or over 90 per cent. of the whole. Coming to the point as to the danger of increasing the duration of the period of incapacitation, the hon. Member said he knew he was touching on a somewhat delicate point; but there was no reason why the real facts, as shown by actual figures, should not be brought before the House. The following figures showed how in the Lancashire and Cheshire country the period of incapacitation distinctly increased according to the rate of relief received. In the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society the amount of relief paid in 1873 was 6s. per week, and the percentage of relieved cases was 12·5. In 1874, with the amount of relief increased to 8s., the percentage rose to 13·5; whilst in 1896, with the relief raised to 10s., the percentage rose to 18·3. The case was further proved by the average period of claim. In 1873-76 the average was 2·8 weeks; in 1877-81 it was 3·0; in 1882-86 it was 3·4; in 1887-91 it was 3·8; and in 1892-96 it was 4·7 weeks. Thus between 1873 and 1896 with a rise in the amount of relief from 6s. to 10s. per week, the average period during which the men received payment rose from 2·8 to 4·7 weeks, an increase of about 70 per cent. It was only natural, it was according to the dictates of human nature, that the nearer the recompense a man received approached to his earnings when at work, the more inclined he was to remain off work. Another important point arose here. Under the present condition of things, when a man was off work from accident he was constantly watched by his fellow workmen and by the visiting committee of his society. Under this Bill there would be no such supervision. The whole burden would fall upon the employer, and there would be nobody to look after the men who were being paid unless detectives were employed for the purpose. One of the most important points he wished to bring before the House was the question of the employment of middle-aged and old men. Most employers desired to keep on their old hands, even if it must be at reduced wages. But what would be the effect of this Bill? It was obvious that when a man got to the age of 50 or 60, he became—either through diminished sight or hearing, or decreased physical force—less able to escape the danger of accident, or when accident befell him he had less recuperative power. Therefore, the tendency would be for the employer to get rid of the older men and fill their places with sound young men. This was a very serious thing, for when they recollected that there were at work in the mines of this country 130,000 men over 45 years of age, they would see that there was a great risk of a large number of these men being thrown out of the mines and coming on the poor rates. All employers had to deal more or less with a very large roving class of workmen, who were nearly always on the move, and who in starting on new premises were much more liable to accident under conditions they were not altogether used to, than men who were permanent workmen. For instance, it was a common thing for a workman who might be a second or third rate man to find employment in a mine, and as a matter of habit, to remain there only a few weeks, and the very fact that he was a second or third rate workman made him more liable to be the victim of an accident. Was it reasonable that an employer under these conditions should be liable for his support for the whole of his life? A further serious objection in the same direction was the fact that exactly the same recompense or remuneration or maintenance payment was made to a man to whom an accident happened, if it was a pure accident, for which no one was responsible, as was made if the accident was one which was due entirely to the man's own carelessness. Was it believed that this Bill was framed for the purpose of meeting a crying need or an urgent demand on the part of the class for whom it was formed? Did the House understand that in the case of nearly all industries with which it proposed to deal, provision was already made for the workmen in case of accidents of every kind? Turning to the case of the mining industry, he said it must be remembered that whilst the working of coal mines was attended with a good deal of risk, there was no industry which had been so watched over by Parliament and so protected with preventive measures in the shape of Mines Regulations Acts and Government inspections, as the mining industry, and in which such excellent societies existed for supporting workmen when sick or disabled. The present condition of the mining industry in relation to the employers' liability and accidents was as follows. Probably half the coal mines in the country belonged to the Miners' Permanent Relief Association, which gave relief in case of all accidents, and in the case of the other half the workmen formed sick and accident clubs from which they got relief in the same way, and to both these the employer subscribed to a smaller or larger degree. This mutual arrangement formed part of the contract between the employer and his workmen. If this Bill had the effect of raising the cost of coal it was quite clear that the employer must pay for this in the first place, and whether the producer or consumer would ultimately carry this on his back would be a question depending on the economic law of supply and demand. His special object was to explain what the cost of the Bill would be on the production of coal. This had been worked out in the district covered by the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Permanent Relief Society, the members of which produced coal yearly to the extent of 25 million tons, or about one-seventh of the total production of Great Britain. The cost of the effect of this Bill had been carefully computed, and he was able to tell the House that it worked out (taking the maximum rates of remuneration) at 1·64d. per ton on the coal raised, and 1·78d. per ton on the coal sold, but to this must be added an amount for the cost involved in managing the payment of the fund over a certain district, and on the basis of information received from friendly societies, this would increase the cost from 1·78d. to 2·05d. This calculation, however, made no allowance for big explosions, the figures taken, in fact, making no allowance for explosions at all. On the average of the explosions which had taken place the last few years, this would increase the cost to 2·15d. per ton. This was taking the amount payable under the Bill at the maximum amounts, and some reduction should be made in the estimate for this. On the other hand, the estimate was based upon the time of disablement being the same after the passing of the Act as before, but there was no doubt that the average time of disablement would be increased after the passing of such an Act. The increase in one case might be put against the decrease in another, and from that it seems safe to estimate that the cost of coal would be increased 2d. per ton. On the authority, however, of Sir William Lewis, the well-known colliery proprietor of South Wales, he was able to state that this 2d. would in South Wales be increased to no less than 3d. per ton. At first sight this might not appear to hon. Members as a serious amount, but in relation to the average profit made on coal in the United Kingdom it was a very serious matter indeed. On this point he might read to the House an extract from a statement made by a gentleman who was not in the coal trade, but who was the editor of a well-known organ of the coal trade, and who made it his business to ascertain reliable statistics in regard to this industry. This was what he wrote in regard to the Eight Hours' Bill:—

> "It may be safely estimated that the present average profits made on the coal mines of the United Kingdom do not exceed 3d. per ton."

Mr. Jeans' estimate might be taken as being correct; in fact it was confirmed by a statement made a few days ago by one of the largest coal-owners in the County of Durham, and a Member of the other House, who said that if this Bill became law he would have to stop several of his coal pits in that county. Was it just that a tax of this kind should be levied upon the producer, for it was pretty certain that in the first place the producer must bear the burden. The prosperity of this country depended very much upon our ability by cheap production to maintain the export of both coal as a raw material and the finished goods which were manufactured by the aid of coal. Was it likely that any buyer on the Continent of the 40 million tons of coal exported every year would pay one farthing more for his coal in consequence of a new tax being laid upon the producer in this country? It was obvious that he would not. In the counties of Northumberland and Durham alone the sum paid by the miners to the permanent relief fund amounted to over £90,000 a year, and it was quite clear that under this Act the cost would amount to two or three times this amount, say £200,000 a year. It was proposed, without the least consultation with the colliery proprietors, who had launched their capital in this industry, to place the whole of this burden on their shoulders, and it did not seem unreasonable to ask whether this was a fair or just arrangement. But another illustration of the serious effect of this Bill was given by Mr. Blake Walker, President of the Midland Institute of Mining Engineers, in a letter to The Times this morning. He related the case of a man being caught in the act of smoking in a dangerous mine, and having been brought before the magistrates, and he wrote on this as follows:—

> "The solicitor who conducted the prosecution pointed out that had an explosion resulted it might have caused the death of 400 of Draper's fellow workmen and the destruction of the pit. The Bench recognised the gravity of the case by sentencing Draper to 21 days' imprisonment. But what I wish to point out is that if such an accident had resulted, and has involved the awful loss of life which was possible, the liability of the Rother Vale Company under the Home Secretary's Bill would have amounted to from £80,000 to £100,000, which we may assume would mean absolute ruin to 99 collieries out of 100."

What view did the Miners' Unions take of this Bill? They had in the House three hon. Members from the North of England who had worked themselves in mines, and who deservedly held a high position in the eyes both of the men they represented and of the Members of this House. He had no doubt that the mandate they would receive from the Union would be to support the Second Reading of this Bill, for on comparing it with the Bill brought forward by their own representative, the Member for Morpeth, they were in a position to say, that if their own representative's Bill gave them 1s., this Bill gives them 2s. At first sight this was the natural dictate of self-interest, which was common to all; but the representatives he had mentioned were recognised as having a strong sense of justice, and he felt he was quite safe in saying that not one of these gentlemen would rise in their place to contradict his assertion that this Bill was unjust and unfair in its proposal to place the whole burden of all accidents entirely upon the employers' shoulders. It might be considered by some that he had dealt with the Bill too much from an employer's point of view; but he submitted that the best answer to this was to remind the House that another Bill was before the House backed by the names of the hon. Members for Morpeth and others who represented the workmen. From the names on the Bill he took it that it expressed the wishes and desires and requirements of the workmen themselves, and therefore practically represented the wish of the working classes. He was glad to say that this Bill would have his cordial support, meeting as it did many of the objections he had mentioned to the Government Bill. In his short experience in this House he observed that a frequent inquiry made by the Front Bench in meeting dissentient views on any Measure from this side was, "What remedy do you suggest, or what alternative do you propose?" If he had succeeded in laying before the House some real and serious objections to the Bill, he hoped he might have its indulgence while he submitted six points, which, if agreed to by the Government, would, he thought, mitigate substantially the objections which had been raised against the Bill, and would commend it to this House and the country at large as a useful and beneficent Measure:—(1) It should include workpeople of all classes. (2) It should abolish the doctrine of common employment, and make the employer liable to a workman for the negligence of his fellow workmen. (3) It should leave the existing friendly societies and sick and accident societies, which had been and were such an immense benefit to the working classes, and which were for the most part formed and managed by the workmen themselves exactly as they were. (4) It should provide for the maintenance of every workman in the event of any and every accident, whether caused by his own carelessness or not. (5) The average rate of payment should be the same, or thereabouts, as was now paid by the existing friendly societies, which had been perfectly satisfactory to those concerned. And (6) The payment or maintenance rate paid to a workman when incapacitated by accident should be very much less when the accident was due to his own carelessness than what was paid when the man was hurt through the negligence of his fellow workmen, and this payment again should be less than when the accident is caused by the neglect of the employers. If they had an indication from the Government that these points would substantially be conceded in Committee, a large number of the opponents of this Bill would be prepared to support its Second Reading; but if its present provisions were adhered to, he had not the least doubt in his own mind that it would be damaging to the interests of good workmen, would put a premium upon careless and inferior workers, and would be the means of the discharging of a large number of old workmen well able to maintain themselves under the existing conditions of things, and that it would be a serious blow to many of the important industries on which the prosperity of this country depended. He hoped the promoters of the Bill would consider that he had referred to the question in no carping spirit, as he felt sure it was best to give one's opponents credit for bringing a Measure forward with the best of motives. He felt sure that this was so in this particular case; but in his criticism he hoped it would be considered that he had brought forward no paltry or unimportant objections to the Bill.

Mr. S. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow) observed that there were three or four points brought before the House by the hon. Member for Derby with which he entirely agreed. He had always, when the question of employers' liability or compensation had been under consideration, opposed the principle upon which this Bill was based. During the discussion of the Bill of the late Home Secretary in 1893, the Secretary for the Colonies made the remarkable statement that he was in favour of an adequate substitute. For his part, he had always contended that it was impossible to find a monetary substitute and put it against the sacredness of human life, and if he thought, for one moment, that the present Bill, even if the maximum of £300 could be obtained in every case, would risk the loss of one life he would certainly oppose the Second Reading. The hon. Member for Derby said that he could not for the life of him see why the question of prevention could not go along with compensation. As far as he had been able to read the provisions of this somewhat complex Bill, he did not see that it interfered at all with the question of prevention, because he took it that if an employer was guilty of culpable negligence to which one single accident was traceable, criminal responsibility and punishment for that act would be brought in the case of mines under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, in the case of factories under the Factories and Workshops' Act, and in the case of railways under the Railway Acts. Like the hon. Member for Derby, if the Bill of the hon. Member for Morpeth had been under discussion he would have given it his hearty support, but they were not discussing that Measure, which, he regretted, had not had previous discussion. He hoped the House would consider that they were discussing a Measure that affected millions of human beings in this country, and dealing with, probably, one of the most complex questions that could be discussed in the House of Commons. He hoped it would not be discussed from a Party point of view. He did not think it ought to be considered, for one moment, as a Party question, but as one of humanity. He did not look upon this as an Employers' Liability Bill at all. It was not an Employers' Liability Bill; it was a Compensation Bill, and therefore to be viewed somewhat differently to a Bill which would deal both with the criminal and civil responsibility of employers of labour. He should like to give his honest views in regard to the Measure. While the Bill did not rise to the standard of perfection, he believed it went some of the way towards settling this complex question of a responsibility and compensation for accidents. The first weak point was the limited application of the Measure. It excluded seamen, agricultural labourers, men engaged in the building trade, and domestic servants. He contended there was no sound argument which would justify the exclusion of one single trade. If a man in the building trade met with an accident through a scaffold falling, or some defect in the building, surely the dependents of that man were as much entitled to compensation as a miner or a railway servant? Therefore, if he gave his support to the Bill it would be on the distinct understanding that he should co-operate with other hon. Members to secure the inclusion of all trades within the provisions of this important Measure. The hon. Member for Derby pointed out another defect, and that was that the term employer was not sufficiently defined. Supposing an employer had sublet his works to a contractor, and a man met with an accident, who would be the person to sue, and where would the compensation come from? That was a very important consideration. Another weak point in the Bill was in connection with the question of employers insuring individually instead of insuring as a trade. He could quote a case which occurred in 1889 in North Staffordshire, where an accident took place resulting in the loss of 30 or 40 lives. The case was fought in the Courts, the jury awarded compensation, but the employer, not being able to pay it, went into the Bankruptcy Court, both widows and orphans being deprived of their remedy. In the schedule of the Bill the maximum amount of compensation was defined during incapacity for work, but the minimum was not mentioned. One of the strong parts of the Bill was that it included accidents from all trades. The present Employers' Liability Act, it had been stated over and over again, only applied to 12½ per cent. of the persons injured, whilst it had been pointed out that the present Bill would apply to 100 per cent. of the people injured. That was an advantage, if it was correct, and, of course, they should want a pretty accurate definition of what this meant when the Bill got into Committee. There was one point as to which there was considerable doubt, and that was about this question of contracting out. He had always opposed contracting out, and he should oppose it in any Act of Parliament on which the life and health of people depended, because he thought if there was a necessity for an Act passing, it certainly was unfair that provisions should be inserted for contracting out. They were told by the Secretary for the Colonies that this would not be a litigation Bill or a lawyers' relief Bill, because it would destroy the necessity for all litigation in connection with accidents. If that was correct it was a virtuous part of the Bill, but he was rather inclined to believe—and hundreds of others held the same belief—that even under this Bill there would be considerable litigation, and if this was one of the primary objects of the Government he hoped they would make it very clear before the Bill became law. He should be sorry to take the responsibility of being a party to the rejection of this Measure, but at the same time during the Committee stage he, along with other hon. Gentlemen in that House, would do his best to make the Bill as perfect as possible, with the view of relieving poverty and doing away with the distress and almost ruin which occurred in connection with many of the accidents in this country.

*MR. HENRY SETON-KARR (St. Helens) thought it would be admitted that the Bill contained a new, wide, and very novel principle, and also a principle which had not been asked for by the working men of this country. Before he read the Bill he was, he confessed, favourably impressed by the speeches of the Home Secretary and the Secretary for the Colonies, but he was bound to say that since reading the Bill he had come to the conclusion, without having any intention to oppose its principle, that that principle did involve some very serious objections. He was aware that this was a subject of great complexity and difficulty, the law upon which was now in a very unsatisfactory state, and he, at all events, congratulated the Government on having attempted to deal with it. Those who had sent him to the House were enormously interested in this question, and he, therefore, desired to put some practical objections to the Government. In the first place the Bill seemed to throw far too great a burden on some industries, particularly the coal-mining industry. In the second place it would, in his belief, absolutely kill all existing friendly societies. ["No, no!"] At any rate that was the conclusion he had come to after reading the Bill most carefully, and after considering the facts and figures in the subject. Another objection was that no account seemed to be taken in the Bill of the negligence of the workman himself. For the first time, as he understood the Bill, the employer was to be made liable to a workman injured through his own negligence. His fourth objection was that the Bill would not necessarily decrease litigation. He was in favour of the general principle of compensation contained in the Bill, but he could not agree with the principle of making that compensation take the form of a tax on an industry, for that would amount to taking away with one hand what was given by the other. If a burden was placed on an industry which that industry could not stand, large numbers of men would be thrown out of work, and injury would thus be inflicted on the community. The Bill would throw a serious burden on the coal-mining industry. At the present moment employers were liable for accidents caused by the negligence of themselves, or of persons placed in charge by them; but this Bill made them liable for all accidents, including those arising from the negligence of the workman himself. The principle extended even to inevitable accidents, and inevitable accidents could not be prevented by penalising the employer. The chief argument that had been used was that the industry must be taxed for its victims; but if the industry was unable to bear the tax it would be killed. He submitted that the principle of compensation for inevitable accidents affected the community at large and not the particular industry. Taking the maximum scale of the present Bill, it would impose a burden on the coal-mining industry of 2d. a ton, and to take the example of one colliery alone in his constituency 2d. a ton on the 750,000 tons raised at that particular colliery during the year meant a charge of no less than £6,000 a year. He took the maximum scale because the coal-mining industry was one of the most dangerous, and the wages in it were the highest. He was informed that so far as South-West Lancashire was concerned, this 2d. a ton would make an enormous difference. In the case of small collieries it would have the effect of closing them, and the consequence would be that a large number of men would eventually be thrown out of work, and the injury thus inflicted on the coal-mining industry would largely exceed any benefit that might be obtained under the Bill. Twopence a ton meant 1s. per head of every person employed in the coal-mining industry in the United Kingdom, and would add a burden of £1,600,000 per annum to that industry. He was dealing simply with the question of compensation for accidents to men in the course of their employment. The Bill proposed to give the men the same thing which they had now from other sources, only on a higher scale without their having to pay for it. They would cease to subscribe to their benefit societies because they would know that they would get compensation on a higher scale from their employers without paying anything out of their wages. It might be said that the employers could insure, but he was informed that the rates which the insurance companies would charge would be practically prohibitory. Then with this extra burden thrown on him the employer of labour would be much more particular as to the class of men that he employed. ["Hear, hear!"] He would subject them to a much more rigid examination than was the case at present; and it was obvious that the effect of the Bill would be to prevent a certain class of men getting employment so easily as was now the case. There were only two ways in which a colliery owner could escape from this Bill—reduce the wages or increase the price of coal. He could not reduce the wages without the danger of a strike, and it would be probably equally difficult to raise the price of coal. They knew the importance it was to the glass and many other industries to get their fuel cheap. He put it to the working men's Members to say whether it was likely to increase prevention of accidents if they took away from the men the sense of being careful. He instanced the case of a man who, by lighting a cigarette, endangered the lives of 400 men in a colliery. This showed how important it was to inculcate the duty of care. They all knew how difficult it was to make men careful in the face of dangers to which they were accustomed. The men thought nothing of dangers which caused in others who, like himself, only seldom went down a mine, the liveliest apprehension. In this matter there was a great blot on the Bill. He was not opposed to the principle of the Measure, but he should do his best to amend it. He was not standing there as a colliery proprietor. When he read the Bill he felt inclined to thank Providence that he was not a colliery proprietor. He represented 100 men for one master, and he would sooner lose his seat than support this Bill. The men had not asked for this Bill. The Bill was something entirely new, and he hoped the House would carefully consider it before passing it into law. He did not profess to be an authority on the question. He was entirely in favour of general compensation. By all means let them have a certainty of that, but the question was, who was to pay the compensation? The men were interested in this, and the community were interested in it, and both the men and the community should share the burden of compensation. He knew of the case of the glass industry, where foreign goods were coming in and underselling ours, and the House ought to be careful before throwing these additional burdens on any industry. The burden should be thrown on the shoulders able to bear it. There should be a system of State compensation, so that they should assure that no special burden was put on any particular industry. If the right hon. Gentleman would do that, he should give him his hearty support, and do his best to amend the Bill.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean) said that if he thought that this Bill would destroy the great benefit societies to which the hon. Member for Derby had alluded—the Manchester Unity, the Foresters, and would harm the trades unions—he should not be found supporting it as he should support it. The hon. Member for Derby had offered no argument in favour of the view that he took. He confessed that his own view was that the trade societies, after this Bill passed, would have as ample ground for existence as they had now. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Derby attacked the Bill upon the ground that it did not contain any safety provisions, but he did not defend his Amendment by a single word. The hon. Member evidently wished to defeat the Bill, and had adopted an Amendment which he thought would conciliate the largest amount of support. He agreed with the hon. Member as to the necessity of safety provisions, but felt that in Committee it was quite open to them to insert such provisions in the Bill. The Bill was not in any way limited by its title. It undoubtedly let in the whole question of employers' liability, and it would be open to hon. Members in Committee to make all the proposals with regard to safety which ought to accompany a Bill of this kind. The hon. Member for Gainsborough and the hon. Member for Derby differed altogether as to who would pay under the Bill. The hon. Member for Gainsborough said the employer would pay the whole cost out of his own pocket, and that the whole profits of coal mining would be destroyed by this legislation. Exactly the same thing was said when the Coal Mines Regulation Act was passed, but the profits of coal mining had not been reduced by one farthing. The hon. Member for Derby said the men would pay, and that not one farthing would come out of the pockets of the employers. That was a somewhat speculative argument. He thought that in the case of the well organised trades the cost would come out of the pockets of the consumers, but that in the case of the ill organised trades there might be some tendency for the cost to come out of wages. The hon. Member for Derby concluded by saying that many of those who, like himself, were opposed to the Bill, were opposed to legislative interference with the rights and habits of grown up men. That was an old view, but time was wholly past for speculative arguments on this question. The first remark he had to make upon the Bill itself was that there was no sort of precedent for it. The nearest approach to it—and even that was very distant—was that similar legislation was now being considered in Belgium. The Belgian Bill and this Bill raised the whole question of individual responsibility as contrasted with trade responsibility, and at once opened up the great difficulties which had been hinted at by the hon. Member for Walthamstow. While he thought the Measure was crudely drawn, he was able to defend it against the strictures of the hon. Member for Derby. There was one question which greatly troubled many men outside the House, namely, that of contracting-out, which was connected with the matter of deductions. When the Bill was introduced it was believed it was intended to preserve or retain in full working order and for the purposes of the Bill existing societies, such as the railway societies; but a perusal of the Bill showed that that was not intended. Those societies, if they were to continue at all, would be entirely outside the Bill. The compensation of those societies could not be used as compensation under the Bill. The deductions to which he was opposed put these societies wholly outside the Measure, and it was probable that the promoters of the societies, if they retained their existence at all, would retain it for wholly different purposes. He knew, indeed, that the great railway companies had been contemplating converting their societies into societies for old-age pensions; but he doubted whether such conversion could take place against the wishes of an unwilling member. Sir R. Palmer had given the opinion that it could not be done against a non-consenting member who had begun to receive benefit. It that was so, the House of Commons would have an opportunity when the railway companies proposed the legislation of considering the footing upon which they intended those societies should exist. It was clear, however, that no question of contracting-out as regarded those societies arose under the present Bill. He admitted that there was something to be said in favour of the extension of the Bill; but with regard to the excluded trades there was the enormous difficulty that they must either continue to limit them very much as proposed in the Bill, or, if they extended them, they would be face to face with the question of bankruptcy. There were some trades, or branches of occupation excluded, which he thought might fairly be put into the Bill in Committee. Coming to the larger exclusions, there was something to be said for the view of the Government that it was difficult to extend the Bill to large sections of those excluded trades. As regarded seamen, the Government had a case, no doubt, for dealing with the matter by separate legislation, because seamen were already the subject of wholly separate legislation. But that excuse, while it availed for the exclusion of seamen from the present Bill, did not avail as regarded the principle of their exclusion, and, if this Bill passed, it seemed to him that the Government, on their own showing and on the lines of the proposals they made, were bound to promise to apply a similar system in a similar Bill next year to seamen. ["Hear, hear!"] As regarded many of the exclusions, there was a great deal to be said, but what was to be said rested upon the question of bankruptcy. Take the case of builders. Even as the Bill stood there was very great danger upon this head. The Bill applied to all building operations which were carried on by builders who employed a steam crane. If they were to follow the analogy of the Factory Act, and its factory accidents notification provision, he thought it ought to be extended even more widely. It ought to be extended to all buildings over 30ft. in height, and having scaffolding. ["Hear, hear!"] But, even as the Bill stood in this respect, the danger of bankruptcy was a very serious one. A pension which might be earned, if one might use the word, by the misfortune of a boy of 15 engaged in the building trade, might run for 60 or 70 years—it might run through three or four generations of building employers. The Bill was not very clear what was to happen in the case of one of those arrangements which were very frequent in the building trade, and which, while not bankruptcies, came somewhat near to that—a sort of handing over the business without a formal bankruptcy. Apart from those difficult cases, in a case of bankruptcy any time within three or four generations of building employers, it seemed to him this pension would cease. They made a show of compensation to a man and then frustrated him in his legitimate expectation by a circumstance which he could not control. It seemed to him that the more they considered this question the more they would be driven to look forward to the ultimate assumption, in some form, of the responsibility of these pensions by some authority higher than the individual himself. [Cheers.] Having gone as far as the Government had in this Bill, they undoubtedly would be driven to go further. ["Hear, hear!"] This question of bankruptcy was particularly connected with one which would be the subject of anxious debate in Committee—the consideration of whether the compensation should be by pension or by lump sum. There were difficulties either way, but the Government had not faced those difficulties by putting both principles into their Bill. In the case of Germany there was no lump sum compensation, and weekly pensions had been adopted both for accidents and death. These considerations led him to again say that the task upon which they had entered in this Bill was a larger task than this somewhat crude measure would suggest, and, though he heartily welcomed the House entering upon that task and heartily supported the Bill as an experiment, it could only be looked upon as an experiment which could not end the series of legislation on this question. ["Hear, hear!"] The desire of the Government, no doubt, would be to make the arbitration under the Bill as simple and as cheap as possible, but was it the case that the cost of those proceedings would be low? The Home Secretary, he thought, a little misled the House, though quite involuntarily, in his speech on the introduction of the Bill. The House believed at the time that the cost of the arbitration was to be paid by the community; but when they came to see the Bill they found that that was not the case. The doctor's fee was to be borne by the employer, but the rest of the cost of the proceedings was to be borne by the litigants in the usual way. The fee of the arbitrator was to be paid by the State, but so was the salary of the Judge of the High Court. There was a further point. The County Court Judge was to be arbitrator automatically in many cases, and he wanted to know whether, when he sat as arbitrator, the ordinary fees of County Courts were to be charged or not. This was a matter of very considerable importance to the working classes, because the fees of County Courts were so enormous as to amount to a denial of justice to the poor.

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY was understood to say that the fees would not be paid by the parties.

*Sir C. DILKE said he was glad to have that assurance. He assumed that, not only was that the case, but that, when a point of law was referred by an arbitrator to a County Court Judge, the Treasury would renounce the fees and that they would be paid by the Crown. That very greatly mitigated the objection he had to that part of the Bill, and would greatly simplify the litigation under it. ["Hear, hear!"] A great deal of responsibility would rest on the medical man in these cases. He would be the real arbitrator, and, in many cases, it would be his judgment rather than that of the arbitrator which would decide the case. The medical man who had to decide in cases of alleged shamming would have an immense responsibility. Then it was proposed that the medical man should be paid by the employer. Would it not be far better that he should be appointed by the Home Office and paid by the State? ["Hear, hear!"] He raised that question because, although it was a detail, it was a matter that must be settled by the House before it disposed of the money Resolution touching the expenses of carrying out the Bill. He hoped the Government would see their way to make the Bill more popular, even at some increased cost, and to secure a great improvement in its administration by undertaking the appointment of the doctor either for a stated period or for a district, or case by case, and paying him out of the taxes. Upon any other plan they would not only throw enormous responsibility on the medical man, but in many cases would make it most difficult for him to perform his duty, especially if he were a young man dependent on his practice in a district where his patients belonged almost entirely to the two classes affected by the Bill—employers and employed. He hoped the Treasury would be induced to give way on this point, for he was sure that the Home Secretary and his Friends would be only too glad to take the course he had suggested if the Treasury placed no difficulty in the way. There was only one word more he need say with regard to the Bill. A great deal of attention had been called to it outside in the Press, and he thought that something ought to be said by the Government in the course of the Debate as to their intentions with regard to permanent incapacity. The Bill, to his mind, he confessed, seemed clear. It seemed to him that the first clause had no connection with the schedule, but over-rode it altogether, the schedule being merely concerned with machinery. He had asked authorities learned in the law, and they gave him an opposite opinion. They said that the reference in the first clause to the schedule was so drawn, and the schedule itself was so constructed, that the Bill was at least not clear on the question, or was possibly clear in the wrong way; that was to say, that the Bill did not deal with the diminution of capacity. Still a different trade would be a very common case. He hoped that the Government would in the course of the Debate tell the House that they did intend to cover—as the first clause without the schedule appeared to cover—incapacity of every kind; he hoped the Government would assure the House that it was their intention that the Bill should cover every case of incapacity, as he was sure the House would desire it to cover. The Bill was not clear on the point; it had been read in an opposite sense outside, and he hoped the Government would undertake to make it clear. ["Hear, hear!"] The obvious defects which had been pointed out in the course of the Debate ought not, he thought, to deter them from heartily supporting the experiment which this Bill was to make; and if he expressed any doubts as to details of the Bill, they were largely associated with doubts as to whether they ought not even now to go further and boldly carry out a great extension of what was the real principle of the Bill. [Cheers.]

*Sir EDWARD HILL (Bristol, S.) said he had long taken a very great interest in the question dealt with by this Bill, feeling, as he did, that it was one of serious importance, not only to the employed but also to the employer. He did not propose to go into details and to give figures in their support. These were matters, he thought, more properly dealt with in the Committee stage. He rejoiced at the Bill of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and he felt that he deserved the thanks of the community for the close attention he had given to a very difficult subject. The pleasant feature of the Bill, to his mind, was the recognition of the principle on which alone, in his opinion, this question was to be solved—namely, that of compensation for all accidents, excepting those caused by the wilful action of the workman from intoxication or otherwise. On the Report stage of the Employers' Liability Bill, brought in by the Home Secretary under the late Administration, he ventured to move a series of Amendments which, if they had been carried, would have given the benefits of compensation to all employés, whether the employer were a private individual, a firm, or the State—in Her Majesty's dockyards and arsenals, and even in the Army and Navy; so that no employer should escape liability, and every employé would be certain of compensation. But he was defeated on a Division in which he did not obtain any, or very little, support from the Government side of the House. It seemed to him then, and it seemed to him still, that a Bill which dealt only with a fraction of the accidents to which workmen were liable—namely, those in which negligence could be proved in a Court of Law—was of doubtful benefit to the sufferer. The procedure in Courts of Law was naturally difficult and troublesome, and always expensive. He wished the compensation money to go into the pocket of the injured man, and not into the pocket of the lawyer. It was much better both for employer and employed that there should be a settled sum which would be paid without demur and obtained without difficulty, than that the Courts of Law should be invoked in behalf of an unlimited sum demanded on one side and strenuously resisted on the other. It had been truly said that safety was better than compensation. But he was unable to see how it was possible that an employer's care for his men would be diminished if he had to pay for the whole of the accidents instead of for a portion only of them—that small fraction in which negligence could be proved in a Court of Law. Then it had been said that an employer would relieve himself of liability by insuring. Something had been said on the question of insurance by the hon. Member for the Forest of Dean. Well, he thought insurance should be made compulsory. ["Hear, hear!"] He could not understand why the compensation of the workman should be subjected to the possibility (which he was afraid existed in some instances) of the employer being insolvent at the time when the liability arose. It was said that the Bill would tend to destroy existing societies. Now, he should be sorry if that took place, but he could not see how possibly it could be so. The Bill, relieving the societies from a portion of their liabilities, gave them more power to provide for sickness and old age pensions. He was not in favour of sums of money being paid down, because there was great risk that such sums might be improperly expended or lost, and the sufferer would then cease to enjoy the benefit provided by the Bill. What he hoped would be arranged—and he could see no difficulty —was that the compensation should take the form of inalienable postal annuities, so that, whatever happened, a man would have the benefit provided for him. He was prepared to admit that possibly his own scheme was too comprehensive as well as premature, and he was ready to acknowledge the wisdom of his right hon. Friend in introducing a Bill which dealt with the question tentatively. He had no hesitation whatever in voting for the Bill, hoping that in a short time it would be found that its provisions conferred a great benefit on the working classes of this country, while not putting a too heavy burden on the employers. He hoped that when this was discovered the scope of the Bill would be increased, to the benefit of both classes and to the promotion of that good feeling between them upon which he believed the industrial prosperity of the country depended largely. [Cheers.]

*MR. BROADHURST (Leicester) said he was reminded that night that it was 17 years back that very month that he made his first speech in the House of Commons on the Second Reading of the Employers' Liability Bill of that year. That Bill became law, and it had laid the foundation of every attempt at betterment made since then by successive Governments and private Members. He was bound to say that he viewed with considerable favour the introduction of this the most recent attempt at solving this great problem; and he had great hope of the future of the Bill, not so much for what it contained, except one or two set principles, as for the capacity it possessed to be developed, and the foundation it formed upon which a complete system might be based, which, he believed, might be satisfactory to all classes of the country. ["Hear, hear!"] His first complaint against the Bill was as to its exclusiveness. By the kindness of the Home Secretary that night he was informed that only those portions of the building trade that were in the use of machinery would come under the operations of the Bill. If that was so, at least two-thirds—if not more—of the building trade would be excluded from the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Now, why should 200,000 skilled mechanics and a large number of unskilled labourers be excluded? He was at a loss to understand why; and if the Bill went into Committee he should certainly seek assistance in providing for Amendments that would remove this exclusion of the building trades, from the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] He further thought the Committee would have to consider the advisability of including agricultural labourers within the scope of the Bill. There was seldom a harvest passed in any parish but what there was an accident of some kind to agricultural labourers. The House had behaved exceedingly well to the landlords last year, and he hoped now they had an opportunity of doing an act of kindness to the labourers the Government would embrace it, and include that class in the Bill. Turning to the arbitration scheme of the Bill, he hoped the Government would so safeguard it that men should not be heavily penalised for seeking the protection of a County Court Judge or of some competent authority to be nominated as the arbitrator. He thought if that was done it would facilitate the passing of the Bill through Committee to a very considerable extent. He should also like the Government to see whether they could not make provision for persons who were not totally permanently disabled, but who were partially permanently disabled. A man engaged in the building or engineering trades who lost a leg or an arm would be ruined for the remainder of his life from following his employment, and in such cases it was very seldom that the firms found other employment for the man so injured. He was greatly disappointed in the speech of the hon. Member for Derby. That speech wandered entirely from the purport of the Amendment, which had for its object greater security against accidents. The hon. Member had stated that if the Bill became law it would injure trades unions and must, in some cases, lead to the total destruction of the great friendly societies. For his part, speaking as a forty years member of a trades union, he had not the least fear of such a result. The Bill did not provide out-of-work pay. It did not provide superannuation, and there was no continued assistance of a material kind except there was a severe accident. Surely it could not be said that every member of a trades union, or even a considerable number of them looked forward to receiving injury in order to obtain pensions from the firms by which they were employed. They had heard an extraordinary speech from the hon. Member for Gainsborough. That speech was an exact reproduction of what they heard 17 years back. In the Session of that period an hon. Member who was interested in the coal and cotton industries, and who was also a railway director, speaking from those Benches, declared most solemnly, night after night, that the cotton and coal industries must inevitably be ruined if the Employers' Liability Bill of that year became law, and that, as a consequence of the departure of trade, the railway companies must suffer much depreciation. They knew that those predictions were falsified. They had heard the same doctrine that night from the hon. Member for Gainsborough. For his part he had no belief in anything of the kind happening. The hon. Member had said that the Bill would add two-pence per ton to the cost of the production of coal. It was easy to suggest where some of this cost might come from. The hon. Member for Plymouth had advised him that he intended in the Committee stage to put down such Amendments as would apportion part of this increased charge on the production of coal upon the funds received in the way of royalties, way-leaves, and ground rents, and he would be able to show precedents for that proceeding. He hoped the Secretary for the Colonies would keep on open mind upon that part of the subject, and recognising that these were sources of wealth upon which no extraordinary physical labour was expended, would come to their assistance in seeking to provide that part, at any rate, of this charge should be levied upon the owners of these sources of income. The hon. Member for Gainsborough went on to give six resolutions which he advised the Government to accept and base legislation upon them, but every one of them seemed to be a contradiction of everything he had urged in his speech. He had also told them that if this increased provision was made for workmen during periods of disablement and sickness there would be a strong tendency for them to remain on the sick list for a considerable period, although they were capable of returning to their work. He himself had no faith in the assertion that the true British workman would shirk his work and sham sickness in order to obtain an income from his employer in the way of sick or accident payments. In 1877, when this subject was under the consideration of Parliament, he remembered reading an article—and it was not in a Tory newspaper—in which the writer solemnly described how, if the Bill then under discussion became law, workmen would inevitably commit injuries upon themselves in order to cast a burden upon the employers. He hoped the Government would not listen to any such croakers to-day. Trade and industry had increased by leaps and bounds after every so-called attack upon capital. This was essentially a Bill for Committee. It would not be contested from that side of the House on party lines, but every Member would do his best to assist the Government in improving it. He asked the Government to allow a considerable interval between now and the Committee stage in order that such Amendments as the discussion would have shown to be necessary might be brought in. And if the Government should find it necessary in order to consult all classes interested to postpone the Bill till next year, they need not be ashamed of doing it. The working classes had been attempting to secure legislation for 17 years, and they could easily wait for another six months if necessary. The hon. Member for Morpeth, at the request of the trade unions, had for 22 or 23 years been attempting to abolish the doctrine of common employment, and now those who were strongly opposing the present Measure of the Government would, he understood, willingly support his hon. Friend's Bill. They could not, however, get that Bill, and they were therefore willing to take the Bill they could get. They could not trifle with a Bill that had for its object and aim to give compensation for accidents that would not, under the existing law, be provided for. He himself bore marks on every limb of his body of injuries which he had suffered while working at his trade, and for which, if this Bill had been law, he would have been compensated. He welcomed any honest attempt made in good faith to give greater protection and greater assistance to the workers than they had received in the past. He hoped the suggestions he had made would receive the consideration of the Government, and that they would be prepared to accept Amendments which would greatly broaden and strengthen the Measure.

*MR. ARTHUR STRAUSS (Cornwall, Camborne) thanked the Government on behalf of the Cornish miners for this liberal Bill, which fully realised their most sanguine expectations. Statistics showed that accidents were proportionately far more numerous and far more serious in metalliferous mines than in coal mines. It was heartrending to see the number of men who were blind, or deaf, or cripples in Cornwall. These men had either to obtain a precarious living or to depend on charity, for the provisions made for the Cornish miners were most inadequate. The directors and managers of the mines were also grateful to the Government for bringing in this Bill. They had always been anxious to give ample compensation to men injured in their employment; but, being trustees of the shareholders, they were unable to do so, and this Bill, if passed, would compel them to do that which they had all along desired to do. In this respect they set an example to the colliery owners, for, while the latter would only be affected by the Bill to the extent of 2d. per ton, the Cornish mine-owners would have to pay from 5s. to 10s. a ton additional. The contention that the compensation paid under the Bill would come out of wages was advanced either by lawyers or by hon. Members who were not conversant with trade. He would advise those hon. Members who advanced that theory to go to their constituents and propose that the compensation should be deducted directly, instead of indirectly from their wages, and the hon. Members would then find out what view the working men took of their theory. Nobody who had any practical experience in commerce would assert that because of a small extra charge of this kind, a mine-owner would shut up his mine, and turn his workmen adrift. There was no doubt that compensation would have to be paid by the industry, and the industry alone. It had been argued that the industries of England would be encumbered by this tax, but he would point out that in this country the taxes on industries were far lighter than in any other country in Europe. He congratulated the Government on their ingenuity in picking out the best parts of the German law and discarding the worst parts. About 2¼ millions were annually spent in compensation in Germany, and he had no doubt that there would be a similar expenditure in this country when this Bill passed into law. There were two points in the German law which he would recommend to the consideration of the Government. Instead of a round sum paid as compensation in case of death, pensions were given to the widows and orphans in certain percentages fixed by the law. Then, in the second place, when the bankruptcy of any company was feared, power was given to make application to the Judges for security. The hon. Member for Derby had said that accidents had increased in Germany, but this was not the case. There had been an increase in the number of claims, but this was due to a better knowledge of the law having permeated the working classes of Germany. As a matter of fact, there were less accidents now, as was clearly proved by the death rate. The number of deaths from accidents has gone down from 17 per cent. in 1888 to 9 per cent. at the present time. It had been predicted that there would be more litigation than before. He had made inquiries from a number of Judges in Germany living in those districts in which cases for compensation were particularly likely to occur, and every one said that ever since this law was enforced there had not been a single case in his district of workmen claiming for compensation under the old law. The late Home Secretary told them in 1893 that the average of compensation for injury given in law cases was £42, but in this Bill workmen would get more than £42 on the average. Moreover, the workmen would not go to law if they could help it, but would take what they could get. The hon. Member for Derby had said that there was a great deal of malingering. The insurance authorities of Berlin, however, said that such cases were most rare, because experience had shown that working men themselves condemned malingering, and nobody was better able to find it out than the working man. There had been a few cases in which wrong certificates had been given, but as a matter of fact, when a doctor had been found to have given a wrong certificate his reputation was gone for ever. With regard to the question of appeals, in 1896 9,273 appeals were made to the Berlin Court, that was to say, 23 per cent. of all the cases were entered for appeal. But then the working men could appeal without any_expense whatever, and, therefore, this low percentage showed that there was great content with the decisions. Of these cases 80 per cent. were made by the working men, 18 by the employers, and one per cent by both. Fifty-one per cent of them were for insufficiency of compensation, and the other 49 per cent. for different reasons altogether. At least 71 per cent. of them were rejected, which showed that the awards were satisfactory. As to the question of mines, in his opinion the old and infirm ought not to be employed in mines at all, but if the Government would next Session bring in an Old Age Pension Bill, on as broad and liberal a basis as this Bill, the question of the old and infirm would not arise. Liberal Unionist Members would go back to their constituents with a clear conscience and with the unprecedented record of having fulfilled all the pledges they gave at the general election. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.) congratulated the Home Secretary on the reception that had been given to the Bill on both sides of the House, and he entirely agreed with the views that had been expressed favourable to the principle of the Bill. He imagined that they might take it that this Bill was only a step in the direction of extending a similar status to other classes of workmen. Because it would be a most fatal and far-reaching defect in this Bill if they were to make a privileged class of workmen who would be able, without any negligence on the part of the employer, to obtain compensation for themselves while the residue, the majority of the workmen of the country would be deprived of any residue whatever except of the illusory nature afforded by the present Employers Liability Bill. Therefore, he regarded this Bill only as a tentative step in the direction of enabling every workman to obtain compensation for injury by accident who fell within the definition of a workman within the Employer and Workman Act of 1875. But he was bound to say they were undoubtedly introducing a most novel principle in the law of responsibility on the part of employers in making every employer liable to his workman for any injury which might happen to a workman, be it the Act of God or from any other cause beyond his control, and it was certainly a curious fact to be taken in conjunction with the circumstances, that the class of employers upon whom this onerous burden was to be placed were the class of employer in whose employment there were the smallest number of accidents arising from negligence or from want of care. He spoke with some experience, because he had acted in a legal capacity in relation to various branches of the coal trade for some years past, and he could say there was no class of employers more scrupulous in making wise provision against accidents than the coal owners of Durham and Yorkshire. It would have been wise if those responsible for the Bill had brought in the assistance of the State to assist employers financially in their responsibility. He had studied the German system of compensating workmen for accidents, and he entirely differed from the hon. Member who spoke last as to the expense it imposed on the State. It was not the amount of compensation which caused the expense, but the unwieldy character of the machinery for the purpose of fixing and arranging the details of the compensation. But he believed the German system had been found to act most beneficiently in this respect, that it had placed no undue burden on the employer and had secured the absolute certainty of payment to the workman. An explosion in a coal mine often involved the lamentable sacrifice of 100, 200, or 300 lives. The insurance of certain fiery mines would not be effected except at prohibitive rates. He was perfectly certain from what he had heard from coal owners who owned these fiery mines that they would run the racket of them, while insuring against other accidents. If an explosion occurred and 200 or 300 lives were lost in a fiery mine owned by an individual proprietor, or a limited liability company, whose margin of capital was too small to bear the burden of compensation and the proprietor became bankrupt, or the company was wound up the workman would not get compensation. He asked whether it would not be possible to introduce some provision of compensation in the Bill by which a guarantee might be afforded either by Government help or otherwise, that the compensation which would be applicable to these particular cases should be secured to the workman. Take another case. The Bill provided that in the case of a disabled workman the workman was to receive a weekly wage not exceeding 50 per cent. of the wage which he received at the time of the injury. It was to be paid every week by the employer, and supposing the man remained disabled for ten, twenty, or thirty years at every week end the workman would have to apply to his employer if alive, or his administrators or executors if dead, for the payment of this weekly allowance. If an individual employer went bankrupt, or quitted the country and died, and his family could not be followed, what guarantee was there that the unhappy workman would ever get a penny of his compensation? The only rational way of meeting this point was to provide for the capitalisation of that sum whatever it might be. He believed it was the intention of the Government, and certainly of the Colonial Secretary that the procedure under the Bill should be as simple as possible, but the provisions as to settling matters in dispute by arbitration would open the door wide to litigation. In a large number of cases arising under this Act one or other of these contingencies would arise. In every case there would have to be a long arbitration, with counsel, solicitors, agents and witnesses, and then, perhaps, the unhappy workman would find himself compelled to commence de novo by an action at law. Could anything be more absurd? As to the provision that no workman was to have any remedy outside the Bill, except in the case of what was called the wilful or wrongful act or default of the employer or of some one for whom he was responsible, he would be glad to know the meaning of those words. Was the workman still to be allowed to bring his action under the Employers' Liability Act if there was negligence on the part of the employer or his agent, or under Lord Campbell's Act if there was negligence on the part of the employer, or was he only to have the remedy of this Bill except in the case of wilful or wrongful act or default? If the Bill meant that it would be a disabling statute. It would rob a certain class of persons of rights which they now had under common law and the Employers' Liability Act. He thought, however, that the Bill contained a very excellent principle, but it was desirable that its benefits should be extended over a wider area, and he thought it would be well if the Government were to consider the representations made in the temperate speech of the hon. Member for Gainsborough, as to the possibility of their availing themselves of the excellent model afforded by the German Statute-book and introducing some system by which compensation might be accorded to workmen by direct intervention of the State. [" Hear, hear! "]

*Mr. AUGUSTUS HELDER (Whitehaven) said he had always been of opinion that there should be compensation for all workmen. Consequently he was very glad to learn that the Government intended to bring in a Bill to carry out that object. He had supposed, however, that the course would have been that which had been adopted for many years, of making the workman contribute to some extent to the funds necessary to find compensation for him, but the fact that the Government had determined to throw all the burden on the employers was a very serious thing for many trades, and might affect them very prejudicially. The remarks that had been made as to the collieries were deserving of much more attention than they had received. It was all very well to say that the employers must pay compensation in all cases of accident, but it would not be so easy for them to carry it out. He should support the Bill, but he thought it would require to be very considerably amended in Committee. The better plan, in his opinion, would have been to have encouraged arrangements between employers and their workmen. This system of universal compensation might also have the effect of stopping public contributions in great accidents. Up to the present, arrangements made between employers and their workmen had been carried out with very beneficial effects; but now workmen, when asked to continue their contributions, would say that it was not necessary to do so. The matter was much more serious than people had any idea of. It was argued that the Bill would not have the effect which he had stated, but the figures put before the House by the Member for Gainsborough showed that it meant an extra charge of 2d. a ton on coal, and that was undoubtedly very serious. Although he would certainly vote for the Bill, he hoped it would be very carefully considered in Committee, and that proper arrangements would be made by which the loss would not be so seriously felt. [" Hear, hear! "]

*Mr. ROBERT ASCROFT (Oldham) said that before entering upon the details of this Bill, he would like to ask the Government, as it would save a considerable amount of time, whether they had an open mind on the question of contracting out? As the Home Secretary remained silent he assumed it was not a convenient moment to make any announcement on the subject. He had had some little experience in connection with contracting out and the Employer's Liability Act. He had, during the time he had been practising as an advocate, dozens of cases, and out of those cases he had selected forty at haphazard and gone through them carefully, and he found that in more than thirty out of these forty cases there was no remedy under the Employers' Liability Act for the injuries received, but there would have been remedy and compensation under the present Bill. He was surprised to hear the hon. Member who opposed the Bill suggesting that the time might come when workmen might, by means of malingering, obtain money for injuries which were not so serious as they represented. From his experience he had never known a case of that kind. It was rather difficult for men to malinger who had their legs, arms, or fingers torn off. He would call their attention to the position in which a workman was placed who received an accident and had to fight it. He regretted to say that from his experience the workman had to fight his case to the bitter end. He had been engaged in these cases for employers, workmen and insurance companies, and he knew what defences were raised when a workman sought compensation. The first defence was that the notice was defective, the second, that the workman knew of the defect in the machinery and had failed to call attention of his employer to it; the third, that it was done by a fellow workman, the fourth, that he was not carrying out the orders of his superior officer; the fifth, that he was engaged in work outside his own employment; the sixth, that his injuries were not so bad as represented; and the seventh and last, that the machinery that caused the accident was not defective. Under the present Bill these defences could not be raised. The only question under it would be, "Are you injured; if so, to what extent?" He was surprised to hear it represented that the coal mining industry was going to be swept off the face of the earth by a paltry tax of 2d. a ton. How long was it since they had to pay shillings extra for their coal owing to the strikes? If they could pay then, they could pay now. The consumer would grumble, but at the same time he would pay. In 12 out of the 30 cases he had mentioned, not one penny was received, either by way of gift or by way of verdict. There was a case of a man killed by a shaft falling upon him. His widow was entitled to £150, but she could not bring the employer in guilty under the Act, and she did not get a farthing. In another case a man had his hand torn off and claimed £100, but he was poor, and unable to find means to pay his fees and he did not get a farthing. There was a third case where a man who fell off a scaffold broke his ribs and legs and claimed £140, but as it was shown that he had assisted in erecting the scaffold he got no verdict, because it was contributory negligence. There was a feeling in this country that the time had come for dealing with this question. He should regard this Bill not as an addition to the Employers' Liability Bill, but as a new departure and an instalment only, because the Government would be compelled, sooner or later, by public opinion to reconstruct the Employers' Liability Act. He believed the Bill would compel every employer to insure, and he did not believe that the insurance companies would refuse the risk of insurance. There was nothing that an insurance company would not take. It was entirely a question of premium. Besides, employers in any particular trade could combine for mutual insurance. He was quite sure that it might be left to the insurance companies to protect themselves by a strict system of inspection. There was one proposal in the Bill to which he strongly objected, and as long as he had breath he should oppose that clause, for if there was one clause in the Bill more objectionable than another, it was the clause which allowed contracting out, and did not provide for supervision of any kind in respect to the administration of the scheme. As long as he had life in his body he should oppose that principle. There was no provision in the Bill either that the workmen affected should have the right of considering the scheme. There was no provision for the workman being heard or that the workman should even receive a copy of the scheme; everything was left to the Registrar of Friendly Societies without his knowing the circumstances. In some of the Friendly Societies' Acts there was provision that workpeople could have an inquiry, but there was nothing of the sort here. With respect to the number of trades with which the Bill dealt, he had no hesitation in saying that it wanted widening, and difficulties would arise, especially in Lancashire cotton mills, as to the meaning of the word "employer." He thought it would be most unreasonable, as well as most dangerous, to give power to the arbitrator to say how money should be invested. The money should be invested in the Post Office Savings Bank, the Government giving, if it was thought necessary, a larger rate of interest than that allowed on ordinary investments. Now, he wanted to call particular attention to a case which would, he thought, have a very material influence on those Members who voted in favour of the contracting out clause when the Bill of 1894 was brought in. If there was one thing which influenced Members three years ago with regard to contracting out more than another, it was the mutual insurance scheme of the London and North Western Railway Company that was dangled before the House. He had investigated the scheme, and had received several letters on the subject, and he was of opinion that if ever there was a good investment and a money-making scheme, it was that of the London and North Western Reailway. In the case of total disablement, a sum not exceeding £1 1s. per week for 52 weeks was paid in weekly instalments, and in the case of death only £50 was paid by the company. Was not that a scandal? The workman had to sign an agreement contracting the company out of all further liability, and giving it the right to dismiss him at a moment's notice without assigning any reason whatever. If they found the rich and powerful London and North Western with such a scheme, what could they expect from the poorer and smaller companies? He felt perfectly satisfied that the railway company, when they agreed to pay £50 in case of a workman's death—

SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I think the hon. Member is in error. The sum is £100.

MR. J. BURNS (Battersea): There are two schemes; by one £50 is paid, and by another £100.

*MR. ASCROFT said £50 was paid by the Company and £50 from the fund subscribed by the workmen themselves, but he was under the impression the hon. Baronet the Member for North-West Manchester was not present, and therefore he had not gone so fully into the case. He, however, gave the hon. Baronet notice last week that he intended to make an attack on the London and North Western to condemn their scheme, and to condemn their administration. The scheme provided that the employer should contribute—

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot see how an examination of the scheme of a particular company can be entered upon on the Second Reading of this Bill.

*MR. ASCROFT said his object was to convince those hon. Members who three years ago were in favour of the contracting out clause that contracting out should not be allowed. When the Employers' Liability Bill was before the House, the question whether contracting out was to be allowed was raised. The scheme he was now speaking of was generally cited in favour of allowing contracting out.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is really replying to the arguments used in the case of another Bill upon points which are not raised by this Bill.

*MR. ASCROFT said he would, of course, bow to the Speaker's ruling, but thought that he would have a right to speak on the question of the administration of this fund by the London and North Western to illustrate the objectionable nature of the administration of any scheme. He would, therefore, subject to the Speaker's ruling, explain to the House the manner in which the London and North Western dealt with those servants who dared to make claims of which they disapproved.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not see how that arises on this Bill. Of course, the hon. Member is entitled to argue that the present schemes of railway companies are schemes which would or would not be allowed by the Registrar of Friendly Societies, but that is really the only point which arises in regard to contracting out.

*Mr. ASCROFT said he would not contend further. He simply wanted to show that unless it was fairly administered, any scheme was dangerous. To show it was dangerous he desired to give his experience of the way the largest railway company treated its men. The London and North Western Railway Company's scheme was such a poverty-stricken thing that the company had recourse actually to technical defences when claims were made against it. If contracting out of this Bill were allowed there would be different forms of agreement in different localities, and when a man was injured he would be compelled to go to lawyers to have a construction put upon the particular agreement which he had signed. That would be unsatisfactory, and with a view to limit the expenses, he suggested that a clause should be inserted in the Bill, providing that no solicitor or barrister should conduct a case before an arbitrator. He should vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, but he held himself free to urge the Government in a future Session to extend the operation of the Employers' Liability Bill, to abolish the principle of contracting out, and the doctrine of common employment, and to provide for granting greater compensation.

On the return of Mr. Speaker, after the usual interval,

*Mr. E. H. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said that, while he sympathised generally with the principle of the Bill, and intended to vote for the Second Reading, he thought that it was a Measure which needed most careful scrutiny in Committee. The Bill seemed to him to bear almost in every line the marks of haste. It was a remarkable fact that this Government should bring forward a great and revolutionary scheme without any preliminary inquiry, despite the fact that both the Government and the public were destitute of information on the subject. Further inquiry would probably have saved the Bill from the crudeness and injustice which marked it in almost every part. The Bill teemed with inconsistencies. For instance, it admitted one industry to the benefits of the Bill and capriciously excluded another. In one case it gave compensation to the workman, although he might have brought the injury on himself, and in other cases it left the employer not liable for an injury which his own selected servant had caused. While it gave compensation for any accident, although no human foresight could have prevented it, on the other hand, it gave no compensation for injury to health or loss of life where the risk might have been obviated by reasonable precautions. The Bill, in short, excluded the very persons who stood most in need of protection. The Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Chamberlain) stated that the Government had excluded small employers, because they were dealing with unavoidable accidents in this Bill, and the small employer was no better able to bear the burden of inevitable misfortune than was the workman. No doubt a large class of accidents were not avoidable. But he should be disposed to say that in countless cases accidents were due to negligence, of which the law—at best a clumsy instrument—could not take cognizance, but which care and oversight on the part of the employer might prevent. If these considerations were well-founded, it must at once occur to hon. Members that they were particularly applicable to cases of small employers, who had their businesses much more directly and immediately under their own eyes, than the larger employers. There was very little reason, therefore, for the exclusion of these small industries from the Bill. It was said by the Colonial Secretary that as far as agriculture was concerned there had been no demand. Yet it was a little curious, if not significant, that within a few hours of that statement being made, a Bill called the Chaffcutters' Bill obtained Second Reading, with the concurrence and approval of the whole House, being carried nem. con. What did this show? It showed that the agricultural labourer, and those who represented agricultural labour, were anxious that their industry should be brought within similar rules and regulations to those which applied to factory legislation. He would suggest that if and when the Bill got into Committee, certainly some classes of agricultural operations might be brought within it. ["Hear, hear!"] There was a clause in the Austrian law, which he thought the right hon. Gentleman might very fairly accept as being quite consistent with the general provisions of this Bill, and that would be in effect to include in the Bill any agricultural operation in which machinery driven by steam, water, or other mechanical power was used. ["Hear, hear!"] One word with regard to contracting-out. He did not desire to say much, however, for he believed that in attacking the contracting-out provision of this Bill he would be in effect simply forcing an open door. He gathered that the provision was inserted in the Bill merely to save appearances. The Government were scrupulous on a point of honour—[cheers]—remembering that they defeated their opponents' Bill three or four years ago on the question of contracting-out. They had thought themselves bound in honour to introduce a contracting-out clause into this Bill; but he ventured to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he need not be at all concerned about his consistency, because there was really no analogy between the two cases. It would be quite consistent in the right hon. Gentleman opposite to have stipulated for contracting out in the Bill introduced on that side of the House, and at the same time to have abandoned contracting out in this Bill. He had always held that the case against contracting out, even under the Liberal Bill, was, after fairly balancing the arguments pro and con, an overwhelmingly strong one. At the same time it could not be denied that a plausible case could have been made out, and was made out, in favour of contracting out of that Bill. But the case was now completely altered. Under that Bill it was proposed to provide by the law for only a fraction of the total number of accidents. There was room, therefore, for schemes outside the law. But now this Bill, which they hoped would become a statute, proposed to cover the whole field of accident, and that being so, what possible room was there for schemes outside the statutory provision? It had been suggested that they were going to have a scheme to which the workmen would be asked to contribute so many pence a week. But it was expressly provided that any scheme substituted for the statutory one must be of at least equal benefit to the workmen. That being so, the Registrar of Friendly Societies would not for a moment entertain any scheme which proposed to take any money out of the pockets of the workmen to form a fund from which compensation was to be taken. Therefore, he said that the contracting-out clause was only inserted for show; and he hoped that the Government would take the advice of their friendly backer, The Times newspaper, and drop it. ["Hear, hear!"] Now, with regard to common employment. Most lawyers admitted that it was a bad law, and most laymen contended that it was bad policy. He submitted that it was both bad law and bad policy. He had been under the impression that there was a general agreement in that House with regard to the abolishing of the doctrine of common employment. ["Hear, hear!"] The Royal Commission on Labour, whose Report he had been looking up, assumed that as a result of the Debates in that House in 1893, there was a general agreement in favour of abolishing the doctrine of common employment. If that was so, the case was very much strengthened by this Bill—strengthened, of course, in this way, that as regarded the favoured classes they were practically abolishing the doctrine, and therefore those classes of workmen who were excluded from the Bill would feel that it pressed upon them more harshly and more oppressively than ever when they saw that their fellows were no longer suffering from it. ["Hear, hear!"] One word with regard to the procedure under this Bill. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had very carefully perused Clause 1, sub-section 2, B. As he read it, the clause had this effect—that the workman who thought he had an action against his employer at common law or under the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, could only get into the Common Law Courts to bring his action there through the Committee Room or through the Arbitration Court provided by the Bill. Most distinctly, as the clause was drawn—he did not know whether the Government meant what the draughtsman had put in—but most distinctly, as the clause was drawn, a decision by the Committee or by the Arbitration Court that there had been a wilful and wrongful default on the part of the employer was a condition precedent to bringing an action at common law or under the 1880 Act. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman, or someone else who would speak on the other side, would tell the House what was the real intention of the Bill in this matter; because, if that was to be the meaning of the Bill, it was most monstrous, and would have the strongest possible opposition on that side of the House. [Opposition cheers.] Moreover, he was not at all sure, from the way in which the clause was drawn, that criminal liability was not also ruled out in the same way—i.e., you must have the same condition precedent to criminal proceeding. As he had said, the proposal was monstrous, and he could scarcely suppose the Government seriously intended what they had put into the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for the Gainsborough Division, in a speech early in the evening, said that one of the effects of the Bill would be to throw the older miners out of employment. Well, he thought it was not impossible that the Bill might have an effect in that direction. But such a result was not peculiar to this Bill. It had been the effect of most of our recent legislation with regard to labour, viz., to elbow out of employment less competent labour. ["Hear, hear!"] It would seem that that must be the necessary result of the conditions under which our modern labour was carried on. He accepted, therefore, the objection of his hon. Friend. He admitted, because he believed, that that would be in part the result of this Bill. Did he, therefore, oppose it? Not at all, because he believed that the effect could be met in another way. Hon. Members had pointed out the injustice of allowing the whole burden which this Bill created to fall exclusively on the shoulders of the employers, and they said that the State should bear a part of it. No; as far as accidents were concerned, let it fall on the shoulders of the employer. But then came the point at which the State could very properly intervene. It was the duty of the State to make provision for the men who might be thrown out of employment. It was inevitable, under the modern conditions of English labour, upon which the greatness and wealth of the nation depended, that the less competent men should be elbowed out, and that the older men should lose their employment. Then the State ought to take the matter up. The State ought to see that when these veterans of labour, who had borne the burden and the heat of the day, were pushed aside to make way for younger and stronger men—the State ought to see that they were not handed over to the tender mercies of the poorhouse, but that some provision was made for them, so that they who were really sacrifices to the modern conditions of labour should have some provision for spending their declining years in decency and comfort. [Cheers.]

*MR. J. WILSON (Falkirk Burghs) claimed that special knowledge entitled him to speak on this most Radical Measure. He represented a mining constituency; he was an employer of miners, and he had suffered in his own person by being incapacitated for several months by a mine accident. He desired to express his approval of the principles of the Bill, but would use no stronger word. He had spoken in his own constituency in favour of a Measure of universal compensation to all workmen, and he was, therefore, very much disappointed indeed to find that the Measure was so meagre in its effect. [Opposition cheers.] It certainly largely embraced the class of workmen he represented, and it would therefore to some extent satisfy him. But it would not be such a Measure as might have been expected from this Government—after the many promises its supporters had made to the constituencies. There was no doubt whatever this waa great Bill, and if the Government would only listen to the valuable hints which would be given to them by those who practically understood the matter, it might be made a most valuable Measure. He hoped the Home Secretary would take to heart the hints he had got from supporters as well as from opponents; and in particular that he would include all trades and not attempt the invidious task of selecting certain trades for an employers' liability Bill. He defied the Home Secretary to define the various trades affiliated and embraced in the Bill. He understood the distinction to be that where machinery was employed then the trade affiliated in the schedule would be embraced, but where no machinery was employed, then these should not be classified. In the building trade, for example, the right hon. Gentleman said "It means a large building in which dangerous work is done." That is to say, where a steam crane is employed liability would attach, but where stones were carried up by hand labour the case would be different. In those circumstances many employers would prefer not to employ steam cranes, and yet they knew many fatal accidents had happened from the breaking down of scaffolding. The Bill would affect him, as a colliery-owner, perhaps as largely as any Member of the House, yet he had in his own constituency expressed approval of a Measure which should give compensation to all workmen, but he had always understood they were to have no more litigation. He heard the Secretary of State for the Colonies use the expression that the Employers' Liability Act of 1880, was a lawyers' employment Bill. He was quite sure the present Bill would be to a much greater extent, as it stood, a lawyers' employment Bill. Instead of having two pistols at their head, employers would now have three—the Act of 1880, the common law, and this Bill. [Laughter.] He gave his support to the principle of this Bill only on the condition that the whole benefits of the Bill should go to the employés without litigation, and he was certain this Bill did not do so. He was one of the executive of an association of Scottish mine owners formed exclusively for the purpose of an insurance association for employers of mining labour. They managed the whole details themselves. An idea of the extent of their operations might be formed when he stated that during 1894, 1895 and 1896 they had paid over 5¼ millions of money in wages to the miners. The total death and accident claims he did not feel at liberty to state, but the legal expenses were fully two-thirds of the total amount paid in compensation. But what did they now find in this Bill? They found that it vastly enlarged the liability of mine owners, without amending the procedure in connection with the existing law. There was no limit whatever to the time for recovery of compensation, and no notice of death or injury was required, as was provided by Section 4 of the Employers' Liability Act 1880. What would be the consequence of that? No one connected with a colliery could ever have his affairs wound up in the event of death, or dissolution of partnership. Section 1, sub-section (2) stipulated that the employer should not be liable in respect of any injury which did not disable the workman for a period of at least two weeks from earning full wages, but it did not preclude him from claiming under the existing law for trifling injuries. Section (1) sub-section (3) would involve an employer in a dilemma. If he pleaded that the Act did not apply and succeeded he might be subjected to the expense of a jury trial. If he pleaded that the Act did apply and succeeded he might be subjected to heavier damages than under the Employers' Liability Act. They had heard a great deal about contracting out, they had no such thing in Scotland. They had no friendly societies in Scotland, because according to opinion of counsel obtained after the passing of the Act of 1880, they were advised that the law of Scotland did not permit of workmen contracting away the legal rights of their wives and children. As far as contracting out was concerned, therefore, their withers were unwrung, but the Government must see to it that this Measure was framed in accordance with the laws of Scotland. With regard to the weekly payment, in the event of incapacity, not exceeding 50 per cent. of the earnings at the time of injury, he considered that such an arrangement was unworkable. As to the weekly wage to be paid in case of incapacity, there was no table whereby the value could be ascertained, neither would ordinary annuity tables apply, as the annuity was contingent on incapacity. It ought to be provided as at present, that the claim for incapacity should be fixed by the arbitrator, as it was by the Sheriff and the Court of Session at present, and then there would be finality; and specially there ought to be a provision that the weekly payments should not exceed in all a specified amount, certainly not more than £150, or three years' wages, whichever should be greater. When the Bill reached the Committee stage he should certainly move a direct Motion against the weekly wage, because he found from his own experience that employés themselves did not wish it, and would much rather have a sum of money paid down or invested for them in an annuity. He had heard hon. Members on both sides, who were not particularly interested, so far as their pocket was concerned, in this Bill, say they would much rather hear of the question of prevention of accidents than compensation. But surely the workmen themselves were the best judges of these matters. He should like to see any hon. Member go down to Crewe and argue against this question of contracting out. He was perfectly sure that no hon. Member could accuse the present Government of doing wrong in maintaining contracting out. He was glad to see that in this Bill they admitted of no compromise whatever on that point, and he should not vote for the Second Reading were contracting out not allowed. The House was too much in the habit of treating working men as children, whereas they were quite able to take care of themselves. It had been said that this question of compensation was not a large question. That, however, was not the case. Competent authorities had said that this liability which was cast upon employers would, in the case of mine owners, certainly involve an extra charge of twopence per ton upon coal, and this in many cases was more than the whole profit. He happened to be a shareholder in one of the most extensive concerns in Scotland, which turned out nearly one-thirtieth of the total output of coal in that country. Last year, this company paid a small dividend of 3 per cent. out of reserve; this year it had paid nothing. Hon. Members talked in an airy manner about the pecuniary responsibility that was thrown upon employers, but so far from its being a light matter, it would mean the extinction of many small concerns. It was no slight sacrifice, for the coal trade at all events, to adopt this Bill. For his part he accepted the principle, and was glad to see that the Home Secretary had undertaken this task. He was only sorry the right hon. Gentleman had not gone so far as he himself was prepared to go, and had not embraced all the trades of this country. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman should ever have undertaken the invidious task of selecting some trades and excluding others. It might be said that the Government had selected those which were most dangerous. But if the others were not dangerous all the less compensation would be needed. He hoped the legislation in this most important, most drastic, most radical, and most revolutionary Measure would not be hastily passed, but that it would receive the most careful consideration. The fashion now seemed to be to see how much output could be got through in a Session, and not what would be the most beneficial. A matter of this importance however, deserved the most careful and painstaking consideration, and he hoped the Home Secretary would give an assurance that he would carefully consider the points he had put before him, and endeavour in Committee to secure Amendments in the direction he had ventured to indicate.

MR. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL (Fife, W.) had hoped to be able to congratulate his hon. Friend who had last spoken upon having intrenched himself in a somewhat stronger position than on the last occasion when he volunteered some remarks. But the hon. Member in the course of his remarks had made the incriminatory admission that he belonged to a company which had violated the criminal law of this country by paying dividends out of capital. [Laughter.]

MR. J. WILSON (Falkirk Burghs): I must correct the hon. Member. I said I knew a company which had declared no dividend this year, and which last year took a dividend of 3 per cent. out of capital. I did not say it was my own concern. [Laughter.]

MR. BIRRELL said that his hon. Friend had not conveyed to his mind what he meant to do; for the evident suggestion which he was going to make was that the company to which his hon. Friend had referred, like the regiment in which his hon. Friend was interested, ought to be disbanded. [Laughter.] His hon. Friend had made a good many references to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for South-East Essex, and intimated that he thought little of anyone who could not compress his remarks into 20 minutes. If his hon. Friend would look at the clock, he would find that he was not able to compress what he wanted to say into anything like 20 minutes. [Laughter.] But he agreed with his hon. Friend that it was a very hard Measure that mine-owners and other employers should have these three pistols held at their heads—the Employers' Liability Act, this proposed Act, and the common law. Representing a constituency where one of the trades favoured by this Bill—the mining industry—was carried on, he was certain of the Bill's favourable reception; but he wished to address the House, not so much as the representative of a mining constituency, as one who belonged to a small and transfigured band of law reformers in the House of Commons. It was as a man who looked forward to nothing better than to earn some slight fame as a reformer of the law—["Hear, hear!" from the ATTORNEY GENERAL]—that he expressed his dismay and regret that in any Bill which had upon its back the name of the Attorney General—[laughter]—the opportunity of reforming in some way the common law of the country should have allowed it to go by. It was holding the Legislature up to something like ridicule and contempt deliberately to allow the Home Secretary to frame an entirely new system of law, based upon an entirely novel principle. ["Hear, hear!"] "Come into my parlour," said the Home Secretary,—

> "and you shall there have meted out to you justice on principles very different from those which will be observed if you are foolish enough to go into the Law Courts."

That amounted to a scandal. Such legislation violated the great principle of the House of Commons that there should be for all Her Majesty's subjects equality before the law. [Cheers.] The common law of this country was not an irrational law. The law of employers' liability, as understood by the common law, was a branch of the law of negligence; and it proceeded on the footing that no employer should be required to pay a farthing of compensation unless the person injured could prove that the employer had been guilty of a breach of duty, either in commission or in omission to him. On that the whole law of the country was originally based, and though it might not be a sufficient basis, having regard to the enormous increase of our industrial undertakings and to joint-stock companies, yet in its essence and origin it was an entirely satisfactory basis. But it was not allowed to rest there. Satan found mischief still, not only for idle hands, but for subtle and logical brains to do; and Her Majesty's Judges had taken upon themselves not only to interpret contracts between employers and employed, but to invent them, and to introduce terms into the contracts which neither employer nor employed had ever heard of. There was the doctrine of common employment. At one time it was the shibboleth of Party; and no candidate could appear before an industrial constituency without being asked whether he would vote for its abolition. The doctrine was only invented in 1837. Lord Abinger planted it; Baron Alderson watered it; and the devil gave it increase. [Laughter.] Working men who had never heard of one another, nor had the faintest relation with one another, were held to be in common employment; and if one was injured by the negligence of the other there was no title to compensation. A platelayer, going home after his day's work, was refused damages when he jumped on to a train and was injured by the gross carelessness of the engine driver, on account of supposed common employment. That doctrine was condemned universally when the Bill of his right hon. Friend was under discussion some years ago. There never was a doctrine which made so poor a show in the House of Commons; though for many years men of conscience and honour had hesitated to pledge themselves to its abolition because they imagined it stood so well. When it was boldly attacked not a single employer rose up to declare that without it he could not carry on his business. Yet this condemned doctrine was allowed to remain a part of the law, and the Home Secretary made it a part of the just and reasonable claim which his scheme had upon the working classes, for if they would fall in with the scheme the doctrine would no longer affect them. Then there was the doctrine of contributory negligence, to which the Colonial Secretary had referred in a feeling, becoming, and instructive manner. It rested upon mediæval ideas about the causa causans and the proximate cause of accident; and the Judges declared that on no account must the cause and connection between the negligence of the employer and the injury suffered be severed. This doctrine had stood between the workmen and compensation to the tune of hundreds of thousands of pounds. [" Hear, hear! "] Yet it was a doctrine inconsistent with the general basis of the common law. When, but for the employer's negligence, the accident could not have occurred in stepped the doctrine of proximate cause and connection to do incalculable injustice. Then there was another whole class of cases, governed by that relic of barbaric Latinity—Volenti non fit injuria—where a distinction was drawn between volens and sciens, between the workman who knew he was exposed to danger and the workman who consented to it. And here we had the most highly trained intellects of the country playing fast and loose with men's lives, for no one could draw a line between the man who knew and the man who consented. Judge after Judge had tried to do it, and Judge after Judge had failed. Now it was admitted by this Bill. The great object of the Bill was to put aside that discredited machine, the common law of England, and adopt a law which knew nothing of common employment or contributory negligence or volenti non fit injuria. This was not fair upon the law of this country, and the Attorney General ought not to allow such a thing to happen. [Laughter.] He looked upon the Attorney General as the guardian of the common law. He ought not to allow a rival judicature to be set up next door to that in which he had made a large fortune and a great reputation—[laughter]—but ought to see that the admitted abuses of the common law were altered so that all Her Majesty's subjects should have fair play in this matter. He did not say whether in an experimental measure it might not be wise to begin with certain trades; but the effect of the Bill was that for certain trades all these admitted abuses had ceased, while for every other occupation of the country the horrors of the law remained unreformed. [" Hear, hear! " and laughter.] To depart from the law based on negligence was a most solemn change. They were departing from the law that nobody should pay unless he was to blame; and were saying that short of suicide—for he did not suppose that was within the scope of the Bill—[cries of " Yes! "]—all damage that resulted from the careless, wanton action of the workmen was to be heaped on the head of the employer. That was based on a new principle, namely, that the employer of labour should guarantee and insure the lives of all the persons he invited to join his employment from all accidents whatsoever. He believed that was a just and a proper thing. All the enterprise of this country was carried on by the joint efforts of labour and capital. The capitalist at the most only risked his money. The employé contributed his bones and sinews and risked his life. In case the enterprise turned out a success the capitalist made a fortune; whereas, however, successful the concern might be the workman got out of it just sufficient in the form of wage to maintain himself and bring up his family to lead a life of equally arduous and strenuous toil as that which had bent his own back and shortened his days. It was, therefore, perfectly just and right that the House should in these latter days depart altogether from the old common law ideas of negligence and impose upon every employer the responsibility of insuring the lives of his workmen without entering into the question of how the accident was brought about. But, as a law reformer, he would ask, Why should they expose the Courts of Her Majesty to ridicule and contempt? Why should they allow the Judges to go on administering a law which the Bill emphatically condemned? [" Hear, hear! "]

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): This is a most interesting discussion to lawyers, and I only regret, for my own sake, and still more for that of the House of Commons, that it should fall to my lot to be sponsor for the Bill, and that it is not introduced directly under the auspices of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. I can assure my hon. and learned Friend opposite that I am fully conscious of my inability to do justice, from a legal point of view, to this new departure in our procedure. I am at the same time very glad that, notwithstanding the fact that the Bill is a new and startling departure, its principle has his approval, and that, although he believes that in a more legal and constitutional way the doctrines of contributory negligence, common employment, and volenti non fit injuria, might have been abrogated, still, that so far as it goes, our Measure has his support. I think the Government has no reason to complain of the reception with which the Bill has met. I recognise that from every quarter of the House, whether the matter is looked at from the point of view of the employers or from the point of view of the men and the trade unions, this Bill has received nothing but fair criticism—if candid criticism—during the two evenings' Debate on its provisions; and whatever may be the ultimate fate of the Measure, we may take this consolation to heart, that if the principal complaint against it be, as it undoubtedly is, that we have not included all the industries of the country within its operation, it cannot be such a very bad Bill after all. ["Hear, hear!"] With regard to the Amendment which has been moved by the hon. Member for Derby, I do not know whether he seriously intends to propose that the Bill should be accompanied by some measure of prevention. I imagine that if employers become their own insurers, they will have every inducement to take care that there are no accidents; and it is equally certain that if insurance societies are the insurer, they will take care that the premiums are low in the interest of the employers by whom the best precautions against accident are taken. ["Hear, hear!"] From what I have been able to gather from a study of the question, I do not believe it is accurate to say that in consequence of this insurance in Germany there has been an increase in accidents. ["Hear, hear!"] Certainly as regards fatal accidents the figures show, not an increase, but a decided decrease. My hon. Friend asks that there should be further legislation with a view to securing prevention in dangerous trades. As to that, I think I may say that neither my right hon. Friend opposite, the late Home Secretary, nor, in an humble capacity, myself, have failed to do something to secure prevention against dangerous accidents. ["Hear, hear!"] My right hon. Friend's Factory Act was a great piece of legislation—["hear, hear!"]—and from the time it was passed into law there have been inquiries going on which are rapidly introducing into our most dangerous trades regulations that are best calculated to insure both life and health. ["Hear, hear!"] And having, with the assistance of the House, passed the Coal Mines Act of last year, I think it is not true to say that the House of Commons is unwilling to pass legislation for further strengthening the law which regulates our dangerous industries, and I am confident that, if the responsible Minister thinks it necessary to ask the House for further powers in the same direction, the House will not be unwilling to recognise his demand. ["Hear, hear!"] I now come to the two most important arguments urged against the Bill. The first is that it does not abolish common employment in all industries. My answer is that it does abolish it completely and practically, if indirectly, where it applies. I say, further, that, in developing this new departure, it adopts a better principle in giving the workman, instead of a claim for an unlimited amount, an immediate and direct, though limited, compensation. ["Hear, hear!"] I am confident that if we had introduced into this Bill proposals to abolish common employment in regard to other industries we should have immensely complicated the Measure. ["Hear, hear!"] If my hon. and learned Friend will draw up, as an Amendment, those three or four clauses, which he says can be prepared so easily, embodying the abolition of common employment in respect to those industries which may not be included in the Bill, I am willing to give it favourable consideration. But I am persuaded that if you now raise the question of the abolition of common employment for all industries—including domestic service and employment at sea—you will raise controversies that will materially interfere with the passing of this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] I come now to the great question of the limitation of the Bill. We have followed in this matter the precedent of other countries. On the Continent this law has been applied gradually. I should like to say that the distinction we have made in this Bill is not an arbitrary one. We have got, I think, some general recognition of the fact that in applying this new principle we were bound to proceed in a tentative fashion, with caution, and in the hope that it might win favour and lead to the introduction of what we believe will be a great boon to the working classes of this country and to other classes not included at the present moment. We have applied this principle in the first place where there are most accidents. That may not be a logical thing to do, but it is a practical thing to do. It certainly is no satisfaction to a man working in an excluded employment to know that he is not able to get the same compensation which a workman is entitled to who comes under this Bill, but at least when you are legislating for millions of people it is reasonable to legislate for those trades in which you know by figures that you have most accidents. ["Hear, hear!"] Every trade which may fairly be called dangerous is included, except that of seamen. Moreover, the trades included are those which are, as a rule, carried on on a scale which will enable those who are responsible for them to pay compensation by their own insurance. I should like to say something as to the number of those who appear to me to be included in the Bill. I take the number of workmen in factories, docks, and wharves as 3,600,000; in mines, 730,000; on railways, 465,000; and in quarries, 104,000. As to the remaining class included—namely, those employed in engineering works—I find it extremely difficult to ascertain the number. There are a great many builders and bricklayers, something like 700,000; and under the description of general labourers and navvies another 800,000 might fairly come. At all events, there will be included in this Bill as at present drawn some 6,000,000 at least of the workmen of this country. [Cheers.] Outside the Bill there are those employed in agriculture, whom I estimate at 1,700,000; seamen and fishermen, about 192,000; domestic servants, 2,300,000; persons employed in workshops I roughly estimate at 2,000,000; shop assistants, 500,000; transport services, 600,000—which give a total of something over 7,000,000. I am not at all surprised that many of my hon. Friends would like to see agriculture included, because, unfortunately, where machinery is used those employed in agriculture are liable to the same kind of accidents as those which occur in a factory. But if you consider the few statistics that we have in connection with agriculture, and the number of farm servants who may be classified as domestic servants, you will recognise how great has been our difficulty. The small farmer, moreover, is not as a rule a man who is inclined to insure. Therefore I think we ought not to be in a hurry in this respect, although I am not at all unfriendly to the representations which are made. With reference to seamen, although theirs is a very dangerous industry, I would point out that it is under special laws, and I do not consider that anybody could bring them under this Bill. Under the shipping laws, when accidents happen to seamen in the course of their employment they are entitled to maintenance after the accident, and also to their wages, unless the accident is caused by their own fault. It has never been the practice to bring seamen under such a Bill as this, and I think there is sufficient reason for excluding them. The Government, however, are not indisposed to listen to arguments which may be brought forward. ["Hear, hear!"] As to the question of workshops, it has been said that there may be very little difference between a workshop and a factory, but there is a real and substantial difference, not only in regard to the machinery, but in the actual results as tested by the number of accidents. This year is the first in which we have had a return of the number of accidents in workshops as distinguished from factories, and I find that, whereas there have been in the first three months only two fatal and 34 non-fatal accidents in workshops, there have been 188 fatal and 9,247 non-fatal accidents in factories, the number of workpeople being, respectively, 2,000,000 in workshops and 3,500,000 in factories. In separating workshops from factories for the purposes of this Bill, therefore, we have clearly shown that we are taking those trades in which there are the greater number of accidents. With reference to the question of contracting out, my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham asked me whether the Government had an open mind upon that question. All I can say is that we have thought ourselves bound by our own convictions, and by the pledges which we gave when this question was formerly discussed in the House, to enable the parties, both workmen and employers, to make their own contracts if they so please. ["Hear, hear!"] We have thought that where proper they should do so, provided the terms they made were at least as favourable to the workmen as those contained in the Bill. We have not overlooked the fact in proposing a Bill which confers such a great boon upon the workmen that there may be less incentive to him to join a mutual insurance society, or that the employer, when called upon to bear so much larger a liability, may not be disposed to open his pocket to a great extent; but we do believe that there is yet room for the action of these societies in the case of accidents for which compensation is not paid, or in the case of sickness. I wish to say emphatically that the clause in regard to this matter is so drawn that the Registrar of Friendly Societies, who has an intimate knowledge of the practice of all friendly societies, and who has, I believe, their good will, should be able to take into consideration all the circumstances in regard to these mutual insurance societies. If the workman comes under contribution to the insurance societies we must see that he gets a quid pro quo beyond what he gets by the liability of the employer under this Bill. Therefore, I think the House will not be astonished that we have thought it our duty to introduce this clause. We believe there is no danger in it, that it is perfectly reasonable, and that if employers and workmen, notwithstanding the great boon given to the workmen under this Bill, can see their way to arrange for the same boon to be given in a slightly different way, they ought to be at liberty to do so. The right hon. Gentleman opposite says we have abandoned freedom of contract. There is no such thing as freedom of contract in this country or any other. We make our own arrangements as regards houses or farms under the conditions of the law, which lays down certain conditions with which you must comply; and this Bill lays down certain conditions with which employers and workmen must comply. The right hon. Member for the Forest of Dean talked about the difficulties of the Bill from the point of view of the bankruptcy of the employer, considering that we have adopted the principle of individual and not trade responsibility. I am not indisposed to admit the risk this proposal incurs. It would be an advantage to amend the Bill so as to give security to the workman for the recovery of compensation due under the Bill, whether from a private owner, large or small, or a limited company. [Cheers.] But the right hon. Gentleman hardly expected that the Government could have proposed any scheme of compulsory trade responsibility or insurance. Anyone who has studied the details of the German system will feel that it could never be introduced into this country; and when you look at the enormous expense which that system entails—one-fifth of the total amount of compensation, and in case of mines one-tenth—I am sure it will be felt it would not do here. We hope that by such associations of employers as have been spoken of, and mutual arrangements between cognate trades and industries, employers responsible under the Bill will protect themselves against their liability; and such arrangements made voluntarily, as is the custom in this country, will be far more effective and economical and in accordance with English feeling than any compulsory system. As to litigation, many hon. Members think the Bill will not realise our intention—that litigation should be reduced as far as possible, and that as simple a method of procedure should be found as is consistent with getting ready and speedy justice. Our hope is that boards of employers and workmen will be formed who will be able to come to an agreement. If not, we have thought it best to provide arbitrators. The cost of the arbitrators is not to fall on the parties, nor the fees of the County Court Judge, but to provide counsel to be paid on either side by the State is to ask for more than we can grant. The hon. Member for Derby spoke of the number and cost of appeals under the German system. But appeals in Germany are very different from what they would be under this Bill. In Germany the first compensation is assessed to the workman by an association composed entirely of employers, from whom goes the first appeal to a board composed in certain proportion of employers and workmen. Then there is a further appeal to the High Court of Berlin. There have been many appeals under the German law, and they are increasing in number. But surely no argument can be drawn from that that there will be an increase of litigation under this Bill, because we provide no system similar. As to malingering, the Bill provides that there will be no payment for the first two weeks. In Germany there is no payment for the first 13 weeks, except under the sick insurance, to which both parties contribute. But, by providing proper precautions and seeing there is a proper medical officer, and relying on the action of friendly societies, who may be in many cases giving extra help, we do not fear any increase of malingering, which is not common in Great Britain. I do not believe there has been any increase of bad feeling between workman and employer in Germany; as far as I have studied the report of the American Commission on Labour I understand they came to a similar conclusion. Nothing has been said to-night, or very little, upon the scale we adopt in the schedule. I think it is not a scale which is open to attack on the score of liberality. ["Hear, hear!"] If more is wanted, I think it ought to be provided from other sources. I believe, generally, when we come to the question in Committee that it will be felt that, on the whole, when we impose this universal liability the scale proposed in the Bill is not inadequate. I admit that there are objections to some of the provisions, and that there are details that require to be amended. You may argue in favour of a pension for a considerable number of years, or in favour of a payment down. You may argue in favour of a pension because in many cases it would be easier for the employer to pay; and you may argue for the payment of a fixed sum down because if paid it is paid once for all, and it can be, possibly, recovered from an association or company which could not be depended on for payment in the case of a pension for a considerable number of years. These are details, as also the question of partial incapacity, and questions of that sort, about which the Government are perfectly ready to consider any suggestions that may be made to them. ["Hear, hear!"] On the question of cost, we have heard two or three conflicting speeches to-night. I am fully sensible, and I am sure the Government are also, that if, upon consideration, it turns out that the conditions of the Bill are likely to be onerous to the trade of the country, they ought not to be imposed. I have taken the coal-mining industry as the principal industry that will be affected—["hear, hear!"]—and I have worked out what would be the percentage of compensation to the wages paid in this country. I was astonished at the figures given to-night by the hon. Gentleman opposite. He said that the advice given to him, and his own knowledge led him to the conclusion that the liability under this Bill will impose on the general coal trade of Great Britain an extra charge of 2d. a ton. If that be so, I admit that it is a serious charge. ["Hear, hear!"] But my figures point in another direction. I have worked the thing out from two points of view. First of all, I have taken the German experience. I have taken the number of German accidents, I have allowed for different conditions and circumstances, I have allowed for the 13 weeks under the German system and the two weeks under ours, I have allowed for the higher scale in Germany, which is roughly as four to our three, and the extra risk, and I have found that the percentage of compensation paid to the wages in any one year would be just a little over one per cent. I do not say that these figures are of any great value, but I have checked them with the figures for Great Britain; and when I come to work out the figures for Great Britain I find the result comes to something near the same figure. I have taken the number of deaths from 1891 to 1895, which gives a yearly average of 1,046. I have used the figures of the Lancashire and Cheshire Miners' Relief Society as typical of the rest of England, and I have found them corroborated by the figures of Northumberland and Durham.

Sir JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): We make out the figure in Northumberland at 1d.

*Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: My figures are taken for the whole of Great Britain. I admit that one district may be different from another and the risk may be different; but I use these figures for the purpose of ascertaining the number of men who would leave widows and whose widows and children would have to be paid under the scale in this Bill, and the number of men killed whose funeral expenses would have to be paid, and with a further computation for non-fatal accidents, I have arrived at exactly the same result as is obtained from the German figures. Taking the total wages at £39,000,000, the total payments in one year would be about £500,000, and that gives a percentage of about 1·2; and if I take the output of coal at 189,000,000 tons, it is very easy to see that that would work out at about ¾d.

per ton. That is rather different to 2d. a ton. ["Hear, hear!"] Mr. Merivale, the celebrated mining engineer, puts the cost at two-thirds of a penny per ton.

MR. BAINBRIDGE said he was very glad the right hon. Gentleman and himself had chosen the same district, namely, Lancashire and Cheshire, as a test. He could certainly show that the cost in that district would be 2d. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I will leave my hon. Friend to fight that out with Mr. Merivale. Working it out in two totally different ways, I have arrived at the same figure.

MR. SETON-KARR: Has the right hon. Gentleman made his calculations on the maximum scale?

*SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: No, not on the maximum, because everybody does not receive the maximum. I have made what I believe to be the fairest calculation, and I have taken the average wage at 23s. a week, whereas, I believe, it is now 26s. The hon. Member for Derby spoke of new liability; but I am sure he will admit that, whatever the amount of present liability, there are great moral claims which are freely recognised by many employers. Then there is the great advantage that it will get rid of litigation. That is, at all events, our intention. We shall try to make the Bill safe in that direction. I do not think that this Bill involves a serious burden on employers in this country. ["Hear, hear!"] Several details have been mentioned in the course of the Debate, but I do not think that there are any of them to which I need particularly refer. There is the danger of bankruptcy which I think ought to be considered. Then there was a reference to the payment of doctors; that will have our consideration. I think we have swept away a great deal as to contributory negligence. I have discussed this matter with employers, and there is great difficulty, and a great many people do feel that, after all, it is better to pay compensation than to run the chance of litigation. We believe that this Bill will minimise the hardship which attaches to the workmen in securing compensation, and we believe that it will tend to diminish litigation. If there are objections to the details of the Bill, we shall be willing to consider them. Our object has been to establish a principle which we hope will commend itself not only to this House, but to the country in general. I cannot admit that the Bill, as has been said, has been crudely drafted; on the contrary, I can assure the House that the Bill is based on a principle which we believe to be sound and thoroughly impartial in spirit. Under these circumstances I hope the House will be disposed to pass the Measure. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. THOMAS BURT (Morpeth) said he was seldom seized with an overpowering desire to make a speech, and did not care to enter into competition with the many hon. Gentlemen who wished to address the House that night, but he had been so long and so closely associated with the question of employers' liability that he felt he could hardly give a silent vote upon that occasion. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. Broadhurst) had stated that 17 years ago he addressed the House on this question. He was a little surprised a day or two ago when looking over "Hansard's Debates," to find that in 1876—more than 20 years ago—he supported a Bill dealing with the question. On that occasion his Friend, the late Mr. Macdonald, the then Member for Stafford, brought in a Bill to abolish the doctrine of common employment. Sir John Holker, the then Attorney General, opposed the Measure, and pointed out the terrible liabilities it would throw upon the trade of the country. There were at that time very few lawyers in the House prepared to attack the doctrine of common employment, but now it was exceedingly difficult to find a distinguished lawyer, unless he was also a large employer of labour, who would defend that doctrine. The present Bill did not abolish that doctrine, but it certainly very considerably weakened it, and it would be exceedingly difficult to maintain the doctrine of common employment as applicable to the other trades outside this Bill when the Bill became an Act of Parliament. The main principle of the Measure was to provide for all accidents, though it really did not do that completely. It was, however, a great stride in that direction. Personally he had always been anxious that all accidents should be provided for. He had never opposed a general system of insurance on its merits, but he had always objected to a national scheme of insurance in substitution of employers' liability. Attention had already been called to the important exclusions from this Bill. There were the seamen, for example, who were certainly in the category of dangerous trades, and who, therefore, ought logically to be included within the scope of the Measure. There was, however, great force in the argument that seamen hitherto had always been legislated for separately, and that might be a valid reason for their exclusion; but he hoped that an assurance would be given that before long the benefits of this legislation would be extended to seamen. Then domestic servants were excluded from the scope of the Bill, and foremen, managers, and clerks. [Sir M. W. RIDLEY explained that foremen were not excluded.] The exclusion of domestic servants from the Bill of 1893 was, he remembered, severely criticised by the present Colonial Secretary. A good deal had been said about the cost that would be thrown upon employers by the Bill, especially in the mining industry. The hon. Member for Oldham had rather minimised the importance of the question of cost, and had ridiculed the sum of twopence per ton as an amount scarcely worth considering. He might tell the hon. Member that he had been engaged in miners' strikes that were protracted for 17 or 18 weeks, the matter in dispute when narrowed down, being only a penny per ton. In the part of the country with which he was specially connected, 80 per cent. of the total produce was exported. The extra cost there could not possibly be thrown upon the consumer, and, therefore, the question must be settled between employer and workman and might become a serious matter. He believed that in the long run the workmen would have to pay, but he did not mention this as an objection against the Bill. He would like to assure the hon. Member for Derby that, whatever other effect might accrue from this Bill, it would not touch the trade unions injuriously. ["Hear, hear!"] They were too firmly embedded in the confidence, and in the affections of the workmen of the country, for this or any other Bill, or for this or any other Government, even if they desired, which he did not believe they did, to injure them in the slightest possible degree. But there were other institutions of very great value of which he could not speak with equal confidence, although he did not take a gloomy view of the effects of this Bill upon them. He referred to the Miners' Permanent Relief Funds. ["Hear, hear!"] These institutions had about 300,000 members at the present time throughout the country. The parent society was the Northumberland and Durham Miners' Permanent Relief Fund, which in 1896 had a membership of 122,000. The members' contributions last year were £99,167, and the owners' percentages were £4,585. There were paid to widows and children £20,500; to men permanently disabled, £15,400; and the superannuation to aged miners was £34,000. By their trade unions they also made provision for their unemployed members. They were self-help institutions—["hear, hear!"]—and every one would admit that these societies reflected the greatest credit upon the workmen in the North of England and upon those colliery owners who had contributed to them. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Whitehaven said that if men could get provision quite independent of their societies they would not contribute to them. He feared there would be some tendency in that direction, and he was not at all confident that a Bill of this kind would not injuriously affect these societies. He was not without hope, however, that instead of destroying them the result of the Bill might be to induce employers of labour to approach their workmen with a view to contributing more largely to the support of these societies than they had done heretofore. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Member for Derby said that this Bill would be a sort of high school for malingering. He did not like that word at all, or the idea it conveyed, though it might have some substance in fact. He believed that originally it was applied as a military term. He did not think it was characteristic of the soldier to malinger, and he was perfectly certain that it was an exceedingly exceptional thing in connection with the working population of this country. [Cheers.] His own experience was that for one man who would sham illness when he was not ill they would have a dozen who would go to work before they were fit. ["Hear, hear!"] Workmen, however, like other people, had a great deal of human nature in them, and if Parliament increased the benefits beyond a certain point, and gave a man more for lying idle than for working, he might be put under considerable temptation to remain idle. [Laughter.] His belief was that the best way to deal with this would be to get the workmen and the employers to co-operate. ["Hear, hear!"] The ordinary workman had a stronger dislike to any form of shamming than the ordinary employer, and he was sure that he had far less sympathy with it than the ordinary candidate for Parliament. [Laughter.] Therefore, he thought that if they could get the employers and workmen to combine they would effectively put a stop to anything in the direction of an imposition of this kind. To his mind the weak points in the Bill were in the direction of protection and safety, and he attached great importance to that question. The Colonial Secretary and the Home Secretary rather indicated that something might be done in the way of strengthening the criminal law. He was not one of those who believed that the best way to deal with careless men was to impose pecuniary obligations and still less criminal penalties upon them. He had much more confidence in a thorough and complete record of accidents of all kinds, and in having them thoroughly investigated. Though he disliked litigation, one of its advantages was to let in light and to enable the facts to be got at more thoroughly. While he did not think that the Bill would increase the number of accidents, he was afraid it would not diminish them. That, he thought, was the weak point in the Bill. If the Amendment of his hon. Friend was a mere abstract proposition he would say "aye" to it, but hon. Members were practical men who had to deal with a practical subject; and if he succeeded in being in a majority in supporting his hon. Friend the result would be that the Bill would be defeated. He did not want to defeat the Bill. [Cheers.] He wanted to amend it. It was not a satisfactory Bill; it was not a complete Measure. No Bill would be satisfactory or complete that did not abolish the doctrine of common employment, and entirely prohibit contracting out of its provisions. This Bill did neither the one nor the other, but it was a very long step in a new and good direction. It was experimental; and, as far as he was concerned, he wanted to give the experiment a fair chance of succeeding. Any influence he possessed would be directed rather to amending the Bill than to defeating it. [Cheers.]

MR. C. A. CRIPPS (Gloucester, Stroud) said he agreed with the hon. Member for Morpeth (Mr. Burt) that in its general principle this Bill did not introduce a dangerous experiment but really a most beneficial reform. He was decidedly of opinion that the scope of the Bill went far enough and should not be enlarged in any of the directions suggested. Sufficient attention had not been paid to the limitation of the employers' liability which the Bill introduced. In the first place it was not a question between the existing law and what was proposed in the Bill. They were agreed on both sides that the doctrine of common employment could be no longer maintained as far as the employments included in the Bill were concerned. Therefore it was not a question of a new liability contrasted with the liability already existing; it was rather that of a limited liability to insurance as against unlimited liability to the negligence which would arise if they did away with the doctrine of common employment. Hon. Members who wished to abolish that doctrine were hardly consistent in opposing a Bill which proposed to do away with it as regarded all the more dangerous employments, such as mining, railways, and factories. [VOICES: "We don't object!"] There was a point which seemed to have escaped the notice of those who objected to the Bill. At present employers were liable both for their own negligence and for that of their servants in cases where the doctrine of common employment did not apply. But within the scope of the Bill this liability was removed, and outside the Bill no employer could be liable as regarded the specified industries unless the arbitrator or a County Court Judge sitting as arbitrator found him guilty of wilful and wrongful default. That was a most important safeguard, and a safeguard to which he thought the employers were fully entitled. He did not want to look at the Bill from the point of view of the workman any more than from that of the employer. The Bill ought as far as possible to be a fair adjustment as between the two interests. He agreed with the hon. Member for Morpeth that probably the most perfect adjustment would be made by agreement as between the parties, by their mutual contribution to a common fund. But if they could not rely on the voluntary principle, and they had to introduce legislative enactments, then it was essential that the interest of the employer should have as full recognition and be as carefully protected as the interest of the workman. He had said already that he hoped the scope of the Bill would not be extended. Let him mention one or two points in which its scope might be further limited. He did not wish to reintroduce the principle of contributory negligence. Anyone who appreciated that the Bill was founded on the doctrine of insurance would know that the principle of contributory negligence could hardly come in at all. In his opinion no workman ought to be entitled to any compensation whatever where the accident or injury was directly attributable to his wilful or wrongful act. Suppose a workman had committed an act for which he would be criminally responsible, say, lighting a pipe in a mine. Was he, in respect of a criminal act of that kind, which might do injury to a large number of his fellow workmen, to be entitled to claim compensation either against his employer or any other fund? For his part he could see nothing but injustice in the application of such a doctrine. When the Secretary of State for the Colonies brought forward his Amendment in 1893 he excluded from the operation of his compensation scheme "injuries due to the negligence of the workman." He did not wish to carry his principle quite so far as that, but was it just they should provide compensation—he did not care from what source—when the injury complained of was the direct result of the wrongful and wilful act of the complainant? He agreed as to getting rid of contributory negligence if they wanted to get rid of litigation, but merely to say the man was not to get compensation where the injury was brought about by his own wilful act was not introducing any difficulty, such as they found in contributory negligence; it was merely asking the arbitrator to decide, in the case of the workman, the very same point which under this Bill he was asked to decide in the case of the employer. This Act might be a stepping-stone towards further legislation, and if this House once assented to the proposition that a man was entitled to compensation for injury brought about by his own wilful act, and if they were to apply that principle to all employments in the country, he maintained they would have introduced a principle not founded on justice, but on injustice, which would throw an improper liability on the employer, or upon the fellow workman, or upon the consumer. There were two other points to which he desired to call attention with regard to the scope of the Bill. It was very necessary, to his mind, in order that the employer might be protected, that the extent of the liability should be clearly ascertained. In one respect this Bill in no sense clearly ascertained the liability of the employer. Supposing a man was incapacitated at a very young age, was that to say that the employer was liable to provide for all time an annuity in respect of the injury so suffered? He did not believe any principle of that kind could possibly fairly and properly work as between the two parties. It was not the principle they found in any of their friendly societies at the present day. It was not that he feared malingering or anything of that sort, but whether they were dealing with an individual employer or a company, it would be an essential to the fair working of this Bill that the limit of liability should be fairly ascertained, and they could not ascertain that liability in order to insure against it, and in order to make fair provision for it without they limited in some way the amount of compensation which might be claimed not only in the case of a man's death, but also in case of permanent incapacity owing to some injury suffered in the course of employment. Might he point out to the House that this difficulty was to a certain extent, though imperfectly, dealt with in the Bill itself in this way. The question of the amount to be paid to a man for permanent incapacity might be reopened every three months before the arbitrator, or County Court Judge who acted as arbitrator under this Bill. That would be a most fertile source of the very litigation it was one of the objects of the Bill to get rid of. It would be far better to keep out altogether this power of reopening the question and to settle once for all in the case of incapacity as well as death what the payment was to be within some maximum amount fixed in the Bill itself. He was strongly in favour of the principle of contracting out, and he hoped no concession would be made by the Government in the way of defeating the contracting out clause contained in the Bill. But there was one point to which he would ask the attention of the Secretary for the Colonies. When the matter came before the Registrar of Friendly Societies to decide whether the provisions of the Bill were more favourable, or the provisions under some arrangement made between employers and employed, the Registrar was to look to the conditions as a whole. Did that mean he was to consider all the advantages which the workman got and not merely the amount that would be paid to him either in the case of death or incapacity? These funds contained provisions for sickness, old age, and a variety of provisions, all of which operated more or less directly in favour of the workmen, and he wanted to know whether the Registrar of Friendly Societies had to take all these conditions into consideration when he was considering whether the conditions of the Bill were more favourable or the provisions under a scheme of this kind. If all the conditions were to be taken into consideration, and the whole position of the workman was to be ascertained, then he thought that a large number of these schemes must succeed in future as they had succeeded in the past. But if, on the other hand, they were only to be considered in a limited sense, and the only question was to be whether the amount of compensation in the case of death or incapacity was larger in the one instance than in the other, then he foresaw for his own part not only that no new schemes of this kind would be initiated, but that existing schemes could not endure for any appreciable time. It was most important that the position of the employer under the Bill should be really ascertained, so that in bringing in this novel and beneficial principle, it should be framed on a just, sound, and equitable basis, and it was from that point of view that he had drawn the attention of the House to the three points which he hoped the Government would carefully consider in their future conduct as regarded this Bill dealing with a great question, which might put an end to much friction as between workmen on the one side and employers on the other.

PRISON CLERKS.

Mr. H. C. F. LUTTRELL (Devon, Tavistock): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that there are still 32 prison clerks eligible by age for the post of fifth class governor who are senior to those clerks who joined under special examination on payment of £3 fee, and as the posts are being given to their seniors, and as the average age of these clerks who joined at special examination is now about 40 years, there is little or no prospect of their receiving direct benefit in the customary course of promotion by the special selection of clerks under 45 years of age for the post of fifth class governor; whether the small benefit which might accrue indirectly by promotion of those senior to them will be detracted from by the non-continuance of allowances as acting storekeepers; and, whether he can see his way to reconsider their claims?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): I am aware that there are 32 clerks senior to those who paid the £3 fee, but the hon. Member is mistaken if, as I gather, he supposes that this latter class passed any special examination or have any special claims to promotion. They will, however, receive very considerable benefit from the creation of the new class of governor, as the appointments to that class will be made by selection, not by seniority; and the advantage generally which the scheme will confer by opening up a new path of advancement and increasing the chances of promotion more than compensates for the abolition of the allowance to an acting storekeeper. I am afraid I cannot promise to reconsider the question.

LOCK HOSPITALS.

MR. ARTHUR JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has received a copy of the unanimous Resolution lately passed by the Committee of the Aldershot Lock Hospital to the effect that the attention of the Government should be called to the advisability of insisting on the patients in Home Lock Hospitals being detained until free from infection as in other dangerous, infectious, or contagious diseases; and, whether he can take steps to carry out this Resolution?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): There is not now at Aldershot a lock hospital under military control; but the Government subscribes to a certain number of beds in the Hartley-Wintney and Farnham Union. A Resolution from the Committee of the hospital of the union has been received by the Secretary of State. While sympathising with the object of the Resolution the Secretary of State for War has no power make regulations for the treatment of patients in the hospital.

MR. JEFFREYS asked whether the right hon. Gentleman was aware that there was a voluntary lock hospital at Aldershot in which there were a certain number of soldier patients?

*MR. BRODRICK: Yes, Sir; but that hospital is the Union hospital. With regard to the hospital, the Secretary of State has no power to use it in any other way than as a voluntary hospital.

CONGO STATE.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, after recent revelations as to the administration of the Congo State, Her Majesty's Government will consider the possibility of revoking the temporary lease, by Lord Kimberley, to the Sovereign of the Congo State, of territory on the Nile, the consideration for the granting of the lease, in the shape of a lease of other territory by the Congo State to Great Britain, having been withdrawn by the action of the Congo State?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. G. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): Abuses will, it is hoped, be prevented by the Commission for the protection of the natives in the Congo State, which was appointed in September last. Her Majesty's Government do not regard the present as an opportune occasion for consideration of the circumstances produced by the cancellation of part of the Agreement of 1894.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

MR. D. F. GODDARD (Ipswich): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to two sentences, each of 14 days' imprisonment, recently passed on lads of 15 years of age in Suffolk—one by the Woodbridge Bench of magistrates on a boy who had taken a watch from a drunken man, given part of it away, and exchanged the rest for a pocket knife; and the other by the Mildenhall Bench of Magistrates for trespassing in pursuit of game; and, whether he will consider if he can amend the law, either by legislation or otherwise, so as to prevent the passing of such sentences on mere youths, who are in this way brought into the society of habitual criminals?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: The hon. Member has been good enough to send me a newspaper report of these two cases, but there is nothing in the report which would lead me to suppose that the boys have been treated with undue severity. The question how to diminish the evils attendant upon imprisonment of youths, including that to which the hon. Member refers, is one which is constanly under my consideration.

DIVISIONS (HOUSE OF COMMONS).

MR. J. W. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the Patronage Secretary to the Treasury whether, for the convenience of Members during Divisions, especially when occurring at midnight, the door on the right side of the Outer Lobby, leading directly down to the Members' Cloak Room, could be unlocked before the declaration of the numbers of the Divisions, as is done at present in the case of the door opposite leading to the Library; and whether he would consult the authorities of the House with a view to carrying this out?

SIR WILLIAM WALROND (Devon, Tiverton): I am afraid it would be difficult to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member, but I will discuss the matter with the proper authorities.

FLAX (FOREIGN BOUNTIES).

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there is any bounty upon the deport of flax in Russia, and Belgium, and, if so, what is its amount per ton; and whether there is any bounty on the export of wheat from Argentina; and, if so, what is its amount?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. C. T. RITCHIE, Croydon): I have no knowledge of any such bounties.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would make further inquiries into the matter?

MR. RITCHIE: If the hon. Gentleman will furnish me with the information he possesses, I will consider it, and see whether there is any ground for further inquiry.

ARMY SURGEONS (ROYAL CORPS).

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, in view of the fact that in 1879 the War Office agreed to the issue of a warrant sanctioning the formation of a Royal Corps of Army Surgeons, whether he can state the reasons why legislative effect was not given to this recommendation; and whether the present War Office is prepared to follow the example of its predecessor?

MR. BRODRICK: A proposal to constitute the medical officers a corps of Royal Army Surgeons was made and considered in 1879, but was not adopted. I have explained already the reasons which make the Secretary of State unwilling to reopen the question.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can state the number of cases in which a rural sanitary authority has made application to adopt Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890; and, in how many instances Part III. has been adopted and carried into effect in rural districts?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. HENRY CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Applications for the certificate of the County Council authorising the adoption of Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890, are not reported to the Local Government Board, and I am therefore unable to state the number of such cases. There has only been one case in which a loan has been sanctioned by the Board on the application of a Rural District Council for the purchase of land and the erection of working class dwellings under the authority of Part III. of the Act.

GRAND JURY SYSTEM (IRELAND).

MR. J. P. FARRELL (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state whether the Irish Government have yet considered any scheme for the reform of the Grand Jury system in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. GERALD BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): It is not the intention of the Government during the present Session to deal by legislation with the subject of the Grand Jury system in Ireland.

MR. J. P. FARRELL asked whether the right hon. Gentleman could say that it was the intention of the Government to deal with the matter in another Session?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: No; I think that that would be going too far ahead.

CANALS (IRELAND).

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consent to the appointment of a Royal Commission or Select Committee to inquire into the ownership and management of the canals in Ireland, in view of the general complaint against the system of having canals owned by railway companies whose efforts are directed to divert the traffic to their lines?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: There is only one canal in Ireland owned by a railway company, namely, the Royal Canal, which was transferred to the Midland Great Western Railway Company under statutory powers. Under the Railway and Canal Acts, the company cannot hinder the access of any bye-trader to the canal, provided such trader pays the tolls, not exceeding the maximum allowed by the Board of Trade. I should not be prepared to consent to the appointment of a Royal Commission or Select Committee without further evidence of the necessity for inquiry than is at present before me.

MR. J. P. FARRELL asked whether, if he supplied the right hon. Gentleman with evidence for the traders in the locality, he would consider the matter.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I cannot make any promise beforehand, but I will certainly consider the matter.

MERCANTILE MARINE (FOREIGN OFFICERS AND ENGINEERS).

MR. FORTESCUE FLANNERY (York, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether certificates of competency as masters' mates and engineers are issued to foreigners without naturalisation; and whether any provision, either in the law or practice of the shipping offices exists to prevent a British ship being commanded, officered, and manned entirely by foreigners; and, if not, whether the Government will accept an Amendment of the Undermanning Bill so as to render impossible this source of danger in time of war?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir. Certificates of competency as masters' mates and engineers are issued to foreigners with the prescribed qualifications, without naturalisation and there is no provision, either in the law, or in the practice of the shipping offices, to prevent a British ship being officered and manned entirely by foreigners. I am not prepared to propose or accept an Amendment of the Undermanning Bill to alter the law in this respect.

SIR ARTHUR FORWOOD (Lancashire, Ormskirk): May I ask whether, in any commercial undertaking in the country, there is any law restricting the nationality of the persons employed?

MR. RITCHIE: I believe my right hon. Friend is correct in saying that no restriction is placed upon any industry in this country in this respect.

MR. FLANNERY: Arising out of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, may I ask if it be true that foreigners are debarred from owning British ships or any portion of a British ship by law, and if the right hon. Gentleman—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a new Question altogether.

QUEEN'S DIAMOND JUBILEE.

COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-upon-Avon): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether, in order to join in the general illumination of the heights round the Metropolis, and of the country at large, he is willing to cause the summit of the Victoria Tower of the Houses of Parliament to be illuminated, by electric lights following the tracery, by coloured fires, or otherwise, at 10 p.m. upon Queen's Night, 22nd June 1897?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS, Kent, St. Augustine's): I do not see my way to carry out the suggestion of my hon. Friend. The matter presents considerable difficulties, but I will endeavour to some extent to meet his views, if I find that the difficulties to which I have alluded are not insuperable.

MR. R. ASCROFT (Oldham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that an accident happened at the last Jubilee through a string of flags and other decorations falling across the road whilst the Royal Procession was passing; and whether, with a view to prevent the possibility of any similar accident on Jubilee Day, he will take such steps as may be necessary to bring to the notice of the occupiers of premises along the line of route the absolute necessity of seeing that all flags and decorations suspended across the roadway are hung in a safe and efficient manner?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I cannot recall the accident to which the hon. Member alludes, and I am not aware that I have any powers in the matter. I will look into the matter, however, and consult with the Commissioner with the view of seeing whether any action is possible or desirable.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he intends to make arrangements for the accommodation aboard ship of Members of Parliament to enable them to view the naval manœuvres on 26th June next?

*THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): It is the intention of the First Lord of the Admiralty to make arrangements for the accommodation aboard ship of Members of Parliament to enable them to view the naval review on June 26 next.

MR. M. J. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is prepared to make a statement in reference to the Irish treason-felony prisoners; and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to grant them amnesty in commemoration of the Diamond Jubilee?

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer the Question. I have nothing to add to the declarations I have made in this House on this subject or to what has been stated by the Leader of the House upon it.

MR. FLAVIN: May I ask the right hon Gentleman whether the Government are prepared to take the responsibility on their shoulders of keeping these men in gaol until their legal term expires? [Cries of "Order, order!"]

LONGFORD CANAL HARBOUR.

MR. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland (1) whether, as Chief Law Officer of the Crown in Ireland, intrusted with the carrying out of such measures as tend to preserve human life from destruction, he is satisfied that the Midland Great Western Railway Company of Ireland have fulfilled the obligations imposed on them by statute for the protection of human life in Longford, having regard to the frequent loss of life in the canal harbour there for want of proper railing and fencing; (2) whether he is aware that, at their ordinary monthly meeting on Tuesday week, the Longford Town Commissioners strongly condemned the action of the Midland Great Western Railway Company in leaving this harbour, in which little or no traffic is carried on, and situate in the middle of the Market Square, unfenced; and (3) whether he will call the attention of the Lord Lieutenant or Board of Control, or the Railway Commissioners, to this dangerous part of the Royal Canal, or, in the alternative, will he advise the Irish Government to grant a Commission to inquire into the manner in which the Midland Great Western Railway Company acquired this canal and have managed it since acquiring it?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. J. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): The first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is founded on a misconception of the duties of the Attorney General. The canal and harbour are, I believe, in the same unfenced condition they were in when acquired by the company in 1845, and the company contend that under the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 119, they are entitled to use these works as they are, and are not bound to fence them, but they inform me they have laid a case before counsel as to their liability in that respect, and further report that they have always furnished quarterly reports to the Board of Trade and Board of Control of the various works which have been carried out to maintain the navigation in proper order. The attention of the Board of Trade and Board of Control will be called to the matter. I must decline to advise the Government to issue any Commission, and beg to remind the hon. Member that if the railway company are under any obligation to fence this harbour, an action will lie against them at the suit of any person who sustains injury through the neglect of that duty.

TELEGRAMS (OLDHAM).

MR. ASCROFT: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that all telegrams dispatched from London to Oldham (and vice versâ), which has in the Parliamentary borough over 200,000 inhabitants, have to be sent first to Manchester, and thence transferred by wire to Oldham, thereby causing great delay and inconvenience; whether he is aware that the speech delivered by the First Lord of the Treasury on the Sunday Closing Bill in Ireland on the 12th instant was sent from the House of Commons telegraph office at 4.15 p.m., and only arrived at Oldham at 5.30 p.m., and whether there is any means by which the speed can be increased above two and a-half miles a minute; whether he is aware that great inconvenience and loss is occasioned through there being no direct telegraph wire between London and Oldham; whether he is aware that no telegrams can be dispatched or received at the head office in Oldham between the hours of 10 p.m. and 7 a.m., and that a distance of seven miles has to be travelled before one can be sent from the nearest office; and whether he is prepared to receive a deputation from the Corporation of Oldham, the Chamber of Commerce, and other public bodies in the town, in respect thereof, or to consider the possibility of removing the cause of grievance complained of, with a view to granting to Oldham such telegraph facilities as its importance as a large commercial centre justifies?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. R. W. HANBURY, Preston): The Postmaster General is aware that telegrams between London and Oldham have to be re-transmitted at Manchester; also that the head telegraph office at Oldham is closed between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m., and that the nearest office open all night is about seven miles distant. As to the rest of the Question, he cannot, on this short notice, give any answer, but he will be glad to have an inquiry made, and he will then be in a position to consider whether it is necessary to trouble the Corporation and other public bodies to send a deputation.

CHARGE OF MURDER (CO. TYRONE).

MR. G. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) whether he is aware that two brothers named Maguire were tried at the Omagh Summer Assizes of 1896 for the murder of William Funston, at Trillick, county Tyrone, 9th March 1896, on which occasion the jury were unable to agree; that they were tried again for the crime at the Belfast Winter Assizes of the same year and were found not guilty; (2) is he also aware that after their acquittal they were sent back to prison and kept there till the Spring Assizes at Omagh, 1897, when they were placed on trial for the larceny of money from the dead body of William Funston, though Judge Andrews, who presided at the first trial, told the jury in substance that there was no satisfactory proof of the robbery, as none of the money had been traced to the prisoners, with the result that the jury had to be discharged, as they could not agree; and (3) in view of the fact that the Maguires have already undergone three trials, two disagreements, and one acquittal, that they have suffered over 14 months' imprisonment, and that until the sad occurrence of Funston's death they bore the character of peaceable and respectable young men, will he recommend their release?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: With my right hon. Friend's permission I will reply to this Question. The facts stated in the first paragraph are correct. The representations contained in the second paragraph of the nature of Judge Andrews' charge are incorrect, the rest of the statements in this paragraph are substantially accurate. The Government cannot accede to the course suggested in the third paragraph; and, as the trial of these men is still pending, I must decline to make or concur in any statement as to their character.

WORKMEN (COMPENSATION INSURANCE) BILL (BELGIUM).

*Sir CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will use his influence with the Foreign Office to move Her Majesty's Legation at Brussels to briefly report at once on the proposed Belgian Workmen's Compensation Insurance Bill?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: I have already written to the Foreign Office to ask that this report may be obtained.

ARMY REMOUNTS.

Mr. J. F. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the contention of local experts that the Australian horses are superior to those imported from Argentina, and the strongly expressed opinion to the same effect of British officers in India, he will consider the advisability of despatching to Australia a certain number of remount officers to investigate and report in this connection?

Mr. BRODRICK: The horses at present wanted are for South Africa, and as it is believed that suitable Argentine horses can be delivered there at half the price of Australian horses it is not considered necessary to send to Australia.

COVENT GARDEN THEATRE FUND.

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Parliamentary Charity Commissioner whether any further light has been thrown upon the Covent Garden Theatre Fund since the subject was mentioned last Session; and whether any steps are in contemplation, by amending Act or otherwise, to release this valuable fund and apply it to the charitable objects which its original founders had in view?

The PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (Mr. J. Grant Lawson, Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk and Malton): As the hon. Member has been already informed, this Fund is not within the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, who are not aware whether any such further information has been obtained or such steps taken as are mentioned in the question.

MANITOBA (CROFTERS' SETTLEMENTS).

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether an application for financial assistance has been addressed to Her Majesty's Government by the Crofters' settlements in Manitoba; and whether any decision in the matter has yet been arrived at?

Mr. H. T. ANSTRUTHER (St. Andrews Burghs): It is not accurate to say that an application for financial assistance has been addressed to Her Majesty's Government by the Crofters' settlements in Manitoba, but a communication from some of those interested has been received by the Colonisation Board on the subject, and no decision has as yet been arrived at.

VEHICLES (LIGHTS) BILL.

Mr. JAMES DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state what steps he intends taking with regard to the Vehicles (Lights) Bill, which applies to Ireland, and if passed into law would compel that every cart, car, or other vehicle must have a lighted lamp attached, if travelling after night?

Mr. GERALD BALFOUR: If the Bill reaches the Committee stage the Irish Government will be prepared to consider whether or not Ireland should be exempted from its provisions.

INDIAN AND AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the contract has been signed between the Government and the directors of the Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company for the carriage of mails to and from India and Australia; and, if so, for what period; and whether the Government are seeing to it that the said Peninsular and Oriental Company complies with the law as set forth in Section 210 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894?

Mr. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has not yet signed the new contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company for the carriage of mails to and from India and Australia. The contract will be for seven years. The last part of the hon. Member's Question should be addressed to the President of the Board of Trade.

POST OFFICE ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in accordance with the recommendations of the Tweedmouth Committee as regards good conduct stripes, it is the intention of the Postmaster General to at once issue the full number of stripes to those postmen who have qualified for them by length of service and good conduct?

Mr. HANBURY: Yes, Sir.

MERCANTILE MARINE (ACCIDENTS TO SEAMEN).

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state how many seamen were drowned during 1896, on British vessels, by reason of wrecks or casualties; how many seamen were injured during the same period from similar causes; how many seamen were killed on British vessels by accidents during the same period; and how many seamen were injured from the same cause; and whether he can state the total number of persons employed on British registered vessels during 1896?

Mr. RITCHIE: Figures showing the deaths of and injuries to seamen employed in British ships registered in the United Kingdom are now published monthly in The Labour Gazette. These figures show that, excluding Lascars, the number of seamen reported in 1896 to have been lost by shipping casualties to trading vessels registered under Part 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, was 941, and the number injured was 96. The number killed in such vessels by accidents other than wreck was 728; and the number injured was 2,027. The number of persons employed in December 1896 in trading vessels registered under Part 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, was 188,445, excluding Lascars. The number of Lascars employed in 1896 was 29,999.

BRITISH SEAMEN IN FOREIGN PORTS.

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what are the powers (if any) of Her Majesty's Consuls to impose imprisonment without trial upon British seamen in foreign ports; and if he is aware that several Consuls have so imprisoned British seamen?

Mr. RITCHIE: Her Majesty's Consuls have no power to impose imprisonment without trial upon British seamen in foreign ports.

GIPSIES.

Mr. T. SKEWES-COX (Surrey, Kingston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the necessity of giving powers to County Councils, or other authorities to deal with the question of gipsies and dwellers in tents and vans; and, whether he can now promise to introduce a Bill on the subject at an early date?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: Provision is already made in Section 9 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1895, enabling local authorities to deal by means of bye-laws with nuisances caused by dwellers in tents and vans. This power, however, has been used in a very small number of cases only; and in these circumstances it can hardly be said, I think, that there is a case for further legislation.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): Do these powers apply to Primrose League vans?

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY: They apply only to persons who cause a nuisance. [Laughter and cheers.]

LETTERBREEN PETTY SESSIONS.

Mr. J. P. FARRELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that an election for clerk of Petty Sessions for the Letterbreen district, County Fermanagh, was held on the 19th February last; that on memorials forwarded to the Irish authorities they annulled the election and ordered another to be held on the 21st instant; and, will he say on what grounds the successful candidate was disqualified and the said election voided, and why the candidate who obtained the next largest vote was not appointed without further action?

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: The election to the Petty Sessions Clerkship of Letterbreen, held on the 19th February, was not annulled in consequence of memorials received by Government, but because the election was bad having regard to the terms of the advertisement inviting candidates to apply. A fresh election will take place on Friday next.

SUPPLY (COLONIAL OFFICE VOTE).

Sir W. HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): May I ask what arrangements the First Lord of the Treasury proposes with regard to Friday's business?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester E.): As the House is aware, I arranged, in deference to a wish expressed on behalf of the Opposition, to take the South African Vote next Friday. Since then it appears that it would probably be inexpedient, in view of pending negotiations, that there should be a discussion upon South African affairs at so early a date, and I understand that the right hon. Gentleman has been made acquainted with that fact and has no objection to a change being introduced into the order of our proceedings on Friday. Therefore, under these circumstances, I propose to accede to a request made to me by the Irish Members and to take the Irish Votes instead on Friday. ["Hear, hear!"]

SIR W. HARCOURT: I can only say that when it was intimated to me that discussion in this House might prejudicially interfere with negotiations going on for the settlement of affairs in South Africa, I had no hesitation in releasing the right hon. Gentleman from his pledge. ["Hear, hear!"]

SITTING OF THE HOUSE (EXEMPTION FROM THE STANDING ORDER).

Ordered, That the Proceedings on the Workmen (Compensation for Accidents) Bill, if under discussion at Twelve o'clock this night, be not interrupted under the Standing Order, Sittings of the House.—(First Lord of the Treasury).

MOTIONS.

GROUND GAME ACT (EXTENSION TO COPYHOLDERS).

Bill to extend to Copyholders in certain cases the provisions of the Ground Game Act 1880, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Channing and Mr. Bramston Beach; presented and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Wednesday 26th May, and to be printed.—[Bill 258.]

DISTRICT COUNCILS (WATER SUPPLY FACILITIES).

Bill for giving Facilities for a pure Water Supply in Rural Districts, ordered to be brought in by Colonel Cotton-Jodrell, Sir John Brunner, and Mr. Tollemache; presented, and Read First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 259.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT (1888) AMENDMENT (NO. 2.)

Bill to amend section eleven of the Local Government Act 1888, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Broadhurst, Sir John Dorington, and Mr. McKenna; presented, and Read the First time; to be Read a Second time upon Monday next, and to be printed.—[Bill 260.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WORKMEN (COMPENSATION FOR ACCIDENTS) BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [17th May], "That the Bill be now Read a Second time:"—and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add instead the words;—

> "No Bill dealing with Accidents to Workmen will be satisfactory to this House which does not provide for the prevention of Accidents as well as for Compensation in case of Injury."—(Mr. Drage)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question:"—Debate resumed.

*MR. H. J. TENNANT (Berwickshire), said he intended to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill, and he would like to express his gratitude to the Government for having dealt with this difficult subject in a generous spirit. Two matters of interest had occupied the attention of the House. The first was how far a scheme of universal compensation was likely to act as a preventive of the occurrence and recurrence of accidents. They had been told by the Home Secretary and the Secretary for the Colonies that if they desired to prevent the occurrence of accidents they should seek for that in a strengthening of the criminal law. No one was more in favour of strengthening the criminal law than he was, but there were certain deficiencies in its administration which hindered it from being effective as a preventive of accidents. He contended that the penalties inflicted were most inadequate. There was the case of a boy killed in a factory, and the fine inflicted was £1. There was another case where a man was killed, and there again the fine was £1. It was evident that the criminal law wanted strengthening by such additional help as this Bill would supply. He would ask what was likely to be the effect on the minds of other employers when they saw how easy it was to escape the law? Allusion had been made by his hon. Friend the Member for Derby, and figures had been given showing that accidents had not increased in Germany. According to figures he found that the numbers in 1887 were 15,900, and in 1895, 75,000, and the amount expended in compensation in 1886 was two million marks, and in 1895 50 million marks. In other words, the number of accidents compensated had largely multiplied. The figures were not absolutely convincing, because it did not follow that there were more accidents because of the increase in those reported and their consequent compensation. A further question raised by the hon. Member for Derby was what was likely to be the economic bearing of such a scheme as the present. On whom would the burden fall? Those who, like his hon. Friend and himself, were engaged in industrial production, knew how difficult it was to raise prices, and how reluctant they were to accept diminished dividends. As to the reasons given by the Home Secretary for excluding certain trades, he did not think he had made out his case. Take agriculture. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not included because there were so few statistics in their possession. The returns showed that there were as many accidents in agriculture through machinery as in the whole textile trade. He regretted the exclusion of workshops. There were 79,000 registered factories, and almost one-half of them employed less than ten persons. If the burden was one fitted to be borne by the occupiers of these small factories, it was also fitted for the occupiers of large workshops. The right hon. Gentleman said there were fewer accidents in workshops than in factories, but he did not understand him to say that these figures were conclusive. The Government, by excluding workshops, would exclude a particularly dangerous trade. He alluded to that of generating electricity. The transforming chambers would be regarded as workshops. The dangers in those departments of electric shock were great. Since 1892, 14 fatal accidents had occurred through electrical current, and out of those seven happened in transforming chambers. That afforded a good reason for the Government to bring workshops within the purview of the Bill. Why, he asked, should a person engaged in the bottling of aerated waters be denied the benefits of the Bill? It was not necessary that such bottling should be done in factories, indeed it was constantly done in workshops. In excluding workshops from the operation of the Bill the Government were taking a very serious, if not a retrograde, step, the result of which it was difficult to forecast. But there was an even greater anomaly than the exclusion of workshops; he alluded to the interpretation of the words "personal injury by accident." What was an accident? There was hardly any clause in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Fife to which greater importance was attached, or which gave greater satisfaction to the working classes, than the clause which fixed the responsibility on the employer for accidents to workpeople engaged in dangerous trades. The Government claimed to be dealing with dangerous trades; but was it not idle to make such a claim when they withheld from the operation of the Measure such trades as the white-lead trade, the india-rubber trade, the pottery trade, and equally dangerous trades? ["Hear, hear!"] He maintained that a man who had his health impaired suffered more than the man who met with an accident; because, while they were both debarred from winning their daily bread, the man injured in health handed down to his children a sickly frame and a diseased organisation which unfitted them for useful citizenship. In conclusion, he desired to say that he and his hon. Friends in criticising the Measure were only anxious to strengthen the Measure and to widen its scope. The Government had now a great opportunity, and it was but fair to say they recognised the fact. But if they did not deal generously with the suggestions which had been made from different quarters of the House in respect to the widening of the scope of the Bill, and the doing away with the inequalities of the Measure, he feared they would throw away their matchless opportunity. If, on the other hand, they did deal generously with those suggestions, they would not only earn the gratitude of the House but would "give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death."

*MR. LIONEL HOLLAND (Tower Hamlets, Bow and Bromley) said that to-night they had to consider the main principle and not the details of the Bill. They had to decide whether or not the time had now arrived to cease tinkering with the question of employers' liability, and to put the question upon a permanent, broad, and logical footing. He had listened carefully to the speeches delivered during the Debate, and as far as he could gather three main objections had been urged against the principle of the Bill. It had been said that a system of general compensation covered by insurance would tend to make the employers careless as to the precautions they took for the safety of their men; it had been said that the compensation would be deducted from the wages of the men; and the fear had been expressed that the charge for insurance would be so large as to act as a handicap to the development of trade and enterprise in Great Britain. If the last objection could be substantiated it would, in his opinion, more than counterbalance all the advantages which could be gained from the Bill. But it seemed rather curious that we should be unable to do in England generally what many of the employers in England had done voluntarily, and what was made compulsory upon all employers in most trades in Germany. The system of insurance in Germany was not less satisfactory to the employer than to the employed, although the burden which the system imposed on the employers was no light one. That was not altogether due to the generous nature of the compensation, but in great measure to the immense cost of the management expenses. The latter expenses amounted to one-third of the compensation which was given; and the cost of insurance, which fell directly on the employer, came to from £1 to £1 4s., and £1 12s. in some trades, per £100 paid in wages. It had been said that under this Bill insurance would amount to about 1 per cent., but he had been informed that insurance companies would be able to effect the insurance at about 15s. for every £100 paid in wages. If an employer wished to insure his risk under the present Act he was charged from 2s. 6d. to 5s. for every £100 of wages, but if the doctrine of common employment were abolished, and it was agreed on all sides it should be abolished, the charge for insurance would be raised to about 10s. per £100. Therefore the increase in charge to the employer under this Bill, and a Bill which merely abolished common employment, would be about 5s. per £100 paid in wages. He maintained that the increased charge upon the employer would not be altogether a real charge, because to a great extent he would receive compensation by some indirect benefits which would accrue from the Bill. Litigation would not be altogether abolished, but the opportunities for litigation would be materially decreased. The liability of the employer would be an ascertained and defined liability, and not an arbitrary and unknown liability. Besides this, he would be relieved from many of the charitable obligations, or what almost seemed to be moral obligations, to relieve the relatives of an injured working man or the injured man himself. It was far better that a man should stand on an independent footing and know that what he claimed was under an Act of Parliament, than that he should have to depend on the charity of his employer. This Measure had not, and could not, escape its allowance of gloomy predictions. The prophets of evil had never been absent when any Measure affecting the management of industrial operations had been before the House. An hon. Member opposite, representing the mining industry, had actually declared that the mines of England would be shut up and that thousands of men would be walking over the country without any employment as the result of this Bill. It was curious that, in the Debates on the first Truck Act in 1831, there were Members on the opposite side of the House, foremost among them Mr. Joseph Hume, who stated that if the Bill were passed it would spell the ruin of many of the manufactures of the country, that manufacturers would shut up their works, and that men would be walking about unemployed until the Act was repealed, as they were certain it would be repealed. Since then trade and industry had prospered, and continued to prosper in spite of the fact that Measures of a similar nature, even more stringent in their character, had been passed down to last Session. He only instanced this as an illustration of the fact that the results which were predicted of an alteration of the law were not always the results which ultimately obtained. ["Hear, hear!"] The objection which had been raised that this compensation would ultimately fall upon the wages of the men, was a mere supposition, and he did not think it was a supposition likely to be indorsed by that House. It seemed to him quite contrary to experience, and it certainly was incapable of proof. The rate of wages in Germany had gone up, and not down, since the system of compensation was introduced. It seemed to him that there was only one condition in which it was likely that this charge would fall upon the earnings of the men. That was in the case of a business in which the sale price of an article was cut down to the lowest possible level in order to meet foreign competition, and where that price could not be raised without succumbing to that foreign competition—where the cost of production was so slightly below the sale price that an employer would rather give up business altogether than suffer any further diminution of his profits. In that case, and in that case only, where the cost of the insurance could not be got out of the employer's pocket, and where it could not be got out of the consumers' pockets, was it likely to fall upon the wages of the workmen. These cases were comparatively few, and, so far as German competition was concerned, they must always bear in mind that already German trade bore this charge without any detriment. He only wished to refer to one other argument, namely, that a system of general insurance would weaken the inducement to an employer to take precautions for the safety of his men. In the first place, that seemed to take a precious low view of employers, and, in the next place, Sir Frederick Pollock, in a note in the Report of the Labour Commission, declared that no proof had been adduced of avoidable negligence on the part of employers, and added:—

> "If such proof could be produced, it was the criminal rather than the civil law which ought to be strengthened to meet such a case."

It was quite clear that proper safeguards against accidents was a matter for Factory Acts, Merchant Shipping Acts, and other legislation of that character, and was not a matter to mix up and confuse with demands for compensation. But, admitting that there were employers who would be likely to expose their workmen to unnecessary risk, surely the one way by which they could influence such men as that was by getting at their pockets, and the increased premium which the insurance companies would impose upon them would soon induce a better frame of mind. The object of the Bill, he took it, was to make the pecuniary interest of an employer to safeguard his men the same as the interest of the men in securing that safety. He thought it was reasonable to assume that the very effect of insurance would be to compel in the direction of prevention. He did not wish to lay any stress upon this point, because, whatever system of employers' liability they adopted, it was not likely that it would materially influence the question of prevention of accidents. The subject of precaution against accidents and of compensation for injuries arising from accidents, were two distinct issues, and should be treated as distinct. But, since the late Home Secretary introduced his Employers' Liability Bill, he maintained that the evidence received as to the effect of the working of the German system tended to show that, on the whole, it had acted for the prevention and not the increase of accidents. The present law as it now stood was admittedly defective. It did not provide for one quarter of the accidents which were an inevitable accompaniment of modern methods of industry, and, even where a workman had got a claim against his employer, he was obliged to enforce it by legal action, which was a perfect pitfall for the unwary litigant. To abolish the doctrine of common employment was to leave untouched one-half of the accidents which occurred now, and merely to remove one out of five legal defences which could be made to an action under the Employers' Liability Act. He would remind the House that Sir Godfrey Lushington, in the Report of the Labour Commission—and he was not likely to be prejudiced against the existing state of the law—condemned the whole principle upon which our system of employers' liability was founded. He pointed out the terrors of litigation to workmen; the gross unfairness to workmen that they should have to prove negligence on the part of their employers; and he concluded:—

> "It is quite unsuitable as a remedy to meet the common case of a trifling injury which befalls a workman in the course of his employment, and results in his temporary disablement."

As he understood this Bill, the House was asked to declare in favour of a system which would be more humane than the present system, because it would give a more certain means of compensation. The Bill, he agreed, was capable of amendment; but he hoped that whatever length of time it took to discuss and perfect it in Committee, the House would not get up before it had resolved that it should pass into law. ["Hear, hear!"]

Mr. ANDREW PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars) said there was one point which wanted clearing up to some extent, namely, whether they were debating how to provide compensation for injury, or how to prevent accidents. They ought to make up their minds what sort of a Bill they wanted, because it was certain that a Bill compensating for accidents could not be also a Bill for preventing accidents, except indirectly, by means of its penalties. However, if that were so, this Bill would operate in a much stronger way for the prevention of accidents than any which had preceded it. The Bill of 1893 would only have reached one accident in ten, and even with the doctrine of common employment set aside, the Bill would only have doubled the number of cases that would have been compensated. The present Bill proposed that all accidents in the included trades were to be compensated for, and it would be five times more powerful than the 1893 Bill in the way of prevention. No Employers' Liability Bill had dealt directly with the prevention of accidents. The Bill backed up by the hon. Members for Battersea, Normanton, and Morpeth contained nothing of the kind. It dealt with compensation only. It was perfectly clear, then, that all the Legislature had done to prevent accidents hitherto had been done by special Acts—such as the Mines, Factories, and Quarries Acts. The Bill of 1893 provided many facilities for going to law against the employer; but if there was anything clearly proved by experience under the Act of 1880, it was that workmen could get no benefit from the Law Courts. That was shown by the result of the actions brought under the Act. There was an impression in the minds of workmen not only that all accidents, or nearly all, were preventible, but that a very large number, if not the whole of them, were caused by the employers. The available records showed that the result was quite the contrary. The only recognised record was the Return of convictions of employers and employed under the Regulation of Mines Act. The figures showed that during last year seven owners or managers of mines were convicted of offences connected with safety-lamp explosions. On the other hand, the number of workmen convicted of such offences was 65, while 59 were convicted of neglecting to set sprags and blocks, 44 of offences in connection with the use of explosives, and 137 of carrying matches and smoking in mines. The Return, therefore, showed that the number of workmen convicted of offences was largely in excess of the number of offences proved against employers. Prevention, it was clear, must be carried out in some other way than by the imposition of penalties for the contravention of some particular Act. Workmen and their leaders seemed to have a strong feeling that they could get advantage under an Act of Parliament by going to law. They had encouraged it in every form. Even the Bill just introduced on their behalf gave every facility for going to law, but it did nothing for the prevention of accidents in any other way. The Secretary for the Colonies had told them that in the actions tried under the Employers' Liability Act in England the compensation awarded averaged about £41 per action. That was bad enough. But the figures respecting Scotland were so bad that, candidly, he believed it would have been much better for the workmen if there had never been any Employers' Liability Bill at all. In 14 years after the passing of the Act of 1881, there were 1,762 actions tried in Scotland, in which £363,000 was claimed, but only £17,500 was awarded, which was only 5 per cent. It was certain the workmen of Scotland must have paid that amount in costs. He mentioned these things to show the worthlessness of going to law either to obtain compensation for workmen or to discourage employers and others from causing accidents. It would have no effect at all in making either employer or workman more careful. Nobody was benefited except the lawyers; indeed, in all the Bills brought before the House before this the chief, if not the sole, interest protected was the interest of the lawyers. Another reason for calling attention to this was that he wanted the right hon. Gentleman to take into his careful consideration the question of costs. If the arbitrations under the Bill were to be conducted as arbitrations were usually conducted in this country—say before an official referee—then a workman had better face an ordinary trial. He hoped such rules would be made as would prevent the piling up of enormous costs against those who referred their cases to arbitration. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned that the fees would be paid by the Government; but those who knew anything of County Court practice knew that the fees were a microscopic part of the total costs; and unless the right hon. Gentleman took care to protect litigants in cases of this kind, he felt certain that he would have to come again to the House, perhaps even to abolish arbitration altogether, and set up some simpler and easier method of arriving at a settlement of the question between the parties. The right hon. Gentleman told them last night the number of accidents which he believed occurred in the industries affected under this Bill. No doubt, he had better opportunities for arriving at the numbers than himself. But, turning to the Census Returns, he found that there were 17 millions of working men in this country, and of these four millions were working on their own account, while about 13 millions were employed by others. There were employed in callings with little risk seven millions; with some risk two and a half millions; and in more or less dangerous callings about three and a half millions. There were two employments which he would ask the Home Secretary to include, namely, workmen engaged in the manufacture, storage, and transportation of explosives, and men who were employed in occupations connected with horses, carriers, coachmen, waggoners, carters, and farriers, numbering altogether about 400,000. This work was dangerous, and the men were unable to combine for protection, with anything like the strength and cohesion possible in most other trades. The Home Secretary had been asked if he would introduce a separate Act to deal with sailors, but he had not given an answer. It was to deal with dangerous callings that this Bill was introduced, and going to sea was the most dangerous of all callings; being, according to the Official Returns, five times more fatal than mining. Sailors were already protected to some extent in several foreign countries, but so far nothing had been done for them here, and they were unable to combine to protect their own interests as they led a too scattered life, and obtaining evidence in case of accident to them was almost an impossibility. The Bill contained anomalies and inequalities, and there was no doubt that the position of workmen who were excluded would become intolerable under the Act of 1880. The Home Secretary promised the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Fife to consider an Amendment repealing the doctrine of common employment as applying to all workmen excluded from this Bill. He himself hoped the Home Secretary would also accept Amendments dealing with contributory negligence, or of a workman having knowledge of a defect in the plant which afterwards might have led to an accident, as innumerable actions have been defeated by these defences. Then the Act of 1880 should be amended to the extent of making all negligent employers liable, and not as at present only employers who personally directed the workmen. The notice of injury should also be extended from six weeks up to, say, three months. While the scale of compensation in the Bill might be considered as satisfactory, as no objection had been taken to it in any quarter of the House, it would be unfair to apprentices, as a young man during the last year or two of his apprenticeship would have very small wages, while immediately his time had expired, his wages might be doubled, or become even higher. He believed the Government would have on this point to amend the Bill. As the Bill stood it would be an inducement for employers to engage bachelors, widowers, and men without children in order to escape the consequences of the Act. Should it prove that there were no dependents, the money could be applied to some fund for which use might be found hereafter. Sub-contractors were also left out of the present Bill, and these should be dealt with as they were in the Bill of 1893. He thought with regard to insurance that it must be made compulsory that a workman should have his compensation secured, otherwise cases would arise in which he would not receive anything. The contracting out clause would lead to the extension of Accident Relief Funds, such as were now carried on by many large companies employing many workmen, but small works would be unable to have such Funds with safety; and it was likely that the Registrar of Friendly Societies would not certify for small works with few men employed. In the case of coal mines, insurance must be compulsory, unless the whole of the coal industries of the country combined for mutual insurance, as all the men in any coal pit might be killed by a single accident. Between 1860 and 1891 there were 30 mine accidents in which 4,100 lives were lost. The owners of many of these would have been quite unable to pay compensation, and therefore mine owners must either combine for mutual insurance, or be required to insure with insurance companies; otherwise the miners would have no security for compensation in case of accident. He could not, however, see how every case will be met, unless some Government scheme of management or regulation were created. The insurance offices expended 40 per cent. or 50 per cent. of their premiums in management charges, whereas the London and North Western Railway Company managed their fund for 4 per cent. Mutual trade arrangements could be carried out for as little, and with Government management the work could be done for less. If employers were compelled to insure with companies it will in effect tax their industries for almost twice as much as insurance could be effected for in other ways. Labour representatives had always opposed insurance. In 1886 in a Committee upstairs, they tried to make insurance impossible. An Amendment was proposed which would have made it penal on the part of an employer to insure, and this was repeated at a subsequent Committee. Of course, these Amendments were not accepted, and did not appear in the Bills when they came back to the House. The contention was that it would weaken the trades unions, and also that it would remove the necessity for care by the employer. That was an entire mistake All insurance meant increased security—[Mr. Havelock Wilson: "Not in ships!"]—and greater care. This was true of marine insurance as regarded ships, and fire insurance as regarded houses. Both ships and houses were much better and safer built at the present time than they ever were, and they were so because, in the case of ships, they were compelled to be built in conformity with rules laid down by Lloyds. This remark also applied to companies that did not insure their ships. They must, like the others, build up to the standard or beyond it, for the reason that if they did not do so, no one would ship cargo. Every shipper had to put his goods in a vessel in which he could insure. Therefore, in order to obtain freight, every vessel must be built in conformity with the rules laid down by the representatives of the insurance offices. A word as to the distribution of compensation. It would lead to waste if widows of workmen received in one sum £150 or £200. It would appear to them unlimited wealth, probably never in their lives having known what it was to have as much as £5. The Government should do all that was possible to retain the Miners' Permanent Relief Societies in existence, as their machinery met such cases by paying allowances weekly to widows and children. If these societies were permitted to die out, their machinery could not be recreated. The present Bill was admittedly imperfect, and would require much amendment in Committee. The Government could complete all necessary inquiries during this Session, and take it as the first Bill next Session. It would then become law on the 30th April 1898, which would make only four months delay, and this would furnish opportunities of making it a better Act.

*Mr. H. H. ASQUITH (Fife, E.): When this Bill was first introduced I ventured, on behalf of many of those who sat on this side of the House, to assure Her Majesty's Government that it would be received by us not in the spirit of party controversy, and that its provisions would be examined in a fair and sympathetic temper. Those anticipations, it must be admitted, have been more than realised by the course and character of this Debate. ["Hear, hear!"] And in the brief observations which I shall address to the House—for it is extremely desirable that we should compress our speeches into a somewhat more moderate compass than has been done in one or two cases—[cheers]—I shall speak as one who is not only prepared to accept the principle of the Bill, but is desirous in various ways to extend its scope and to strengthen its safeguards. Let me say at the outset that I do not share in the least the apprehensions which have been expressed in more than one quarter that legislation on these lines—developed, as it must be in the course of time, far beyond the comparatively limited area of this Bill—is likely to impose an insuperable, or indeed a serious, burden upon the industries of this country. As an hon. Member opposite has reminded us, there has not been one single stage of the long and beneficent series of enactments for the protection of the life and health of the working population at which similar vaticinations have not been uttered with the same lugubrious confidence. ["Hear, hear!"] But happily there is not one case which can be produced where those forecasts have not been falsified. ["Hear, hear!"] I am myself certain that among the many new and formidable dangers with which undoubtedly British trade is in these days confronted, our industry is not only not unfavourably handicapped in the race with the rest of the world, but it has enjoyed great and distinct advantages, resulting directly and indirectly from the legislation shortening the hours of labour and improving the conditions under which our industrial life is carried on. ["Hear, hear!"] One other thing. I do not see—and I never have seen—the incompatibility, from the point of principle, which appears to suggest itself to the minds of some hon. Gentlemen between proposals such as those which some of us were engaged in promoting three or four years ago, for the amendment of the law of employers' liability, and the proposals now before the House. They aim at different, but at perfectly reconcileable and perfectly consistent, objects. The primary purpose—although people may differ as to the method—of legislation as to employers' liability is, by fixing a direct personal responsibility on the employer for taking all precautions which skill and foresight can suggest against accident, to raise the average level of safety. The primary purpose of compensation, on the other hand, is to secure that every one who is engaged in what is called "the army of industry," shall, if he is wounded or if his life is cut short, have secured to him and those dependent on him, an adequate provision to meet the necessities of the case. These are different objects, but they are quite compatible one with the other, and I do not see why they should not be pursued at the same time. ["Hear, hear!"] A great deal of reference has been made to the German system. In common with most of those who are interested in industrial questions, I have watched that system pretty closely during the past few years. If I had to state my own opinion of it, I think I should find myself almost midway between the conflicting views of its champions and its critics. But I desire to point out that the German system has nothing to do with the proposals in this Bill, which is framed on entirely different lines. In the conception and in the drafting of the Government's Measure, it is perfectly clear that they have deliberately and for reasons which seemed good to themselves, abjured the German example. The German system is a perfectly logical attempt to combine the two objects which I have described. On the one hand, it does secure to the workman not only a title to, but an absolute assurance that he will receive compensation; because it does not make his enjoyment of compensation dependent on the solvency of his employer, but enables him to have recourse to the whole industrial group to which that employer belongs. On the other hand, the German system aims also at those objects which we have endeavoured to pursue in our law relating to employers' liability. It has a "danger tariff" as it is called—a system under which a higher levy of contribution is exacted for the common fund from the employer who, from the prevalence of accidents in his works, there is ground for believing does not take proper precautions. In the present Bill these features are not reproduced. As regards prevention, as my right hon. Friend very frankly stated, the Bill does not propose to make any change in the existing law, except to the extent that, when the employer has to compensate the workman for all accidents, he will be under an inducement to curtail the area of preventable accidents in order to reduce his total liability. But the Bill makes no direct proposals on the subject, and does not, like the German system, penalise the employer, apart from the compensation which he has to pay, if he is proved to be guilty of exceptional want of care. Still more remarkable and significant is the departure of the Bill from the German example in the character of the security which it gives to the workman for compensation. Do not let it be supposed for a moment that I am quarrelling in this respect with the lines which the Government have pursued. The German system may be very well suited to the economic and social conditions of that country, but its adoption here—resting as it does on the double foundation of compulsory grouping and centralised control—would require us to fly in the face of the traditions and the living tendencies of British industry. [Cheers.] I thought that the Government were perfectly right in discarding that feature of the German system, although it must be admitted that in so doing they have been obliged to deprive the workman of a security which, under the German system, he does undoubtedly enjoy. Let us see how it works out. It is said that under this Bill the employers will insure. I believe that in a large number of cases they will, though there is no obligation to do so. In the textile trades, where the premium paid at present for insuring employers' liability is so trifling as to be an insignificant item in the cost of production, the burden thrown on the employer, even if that premium were multiplied five or ten fold by the Bill, would still be very small; and I do not doubt that in that large industry insurance will be very generally resorted to. But there are other trades in which you cannot predict with the same certainty that that will be the case. I mean, for instance, the building trade and coal mining. Take a case which I am sure is possible and even probable. Take the case of a coal mine in South Wales—one of those dangerous areas where, as we know, however great the precautions taken by the manufacturer, there is a natural and unforeseeable liability to disaster. Many of them are owned by limited companies of which the whole of the capital is paid up. I do not believe that any of the insurance companies would insure an employer in that position against the risks of explosion; but, whether or not, I am certain that the premium which would have to be paid for such an insurance would be so large, and would be such a heavy burden on an industry in which the margin of profit had reached almost the vanishing point, that the owner would rather depend on "the chapter of accidents" than avail himself of that insurance. Then what happens? Sooner or later the explosion takes place and perhaps 200 lives are lost. The minimum payment under the Bill is £30,000, and it may rise to £60,000. What becomes of the workmen? The concern goes into liquidation and the workman has a right of proof, for what it is worth, and I may say that there is no form of litigation so unsatisfactory as carrying in a proof in bankruptcy. The workmen may get a farthing or at the outside sixpence in the pound. Here I beg to assure the House I am putting no imaginary case, but one which is very likely to occur—["hear, hear!"]—and one cannot ignore the probability that the existence of a statutory obligation of this kind will tend to encourage the conversion of many businesses at present carried on by private partnerships into limited companies, thereby, of course, reducing the margin which would be available for compensation to workmen in the event of one of these inevitable disasters. I am sure that Her Majesty's Government and those who support them will agree that this is a very serious state of things, and as long as that is possible it cannot be said that we have solved the question of compensation for accidents. It may be said, What suggestions have you to make? I repeat that I think the Government were right in the first instance in trying the experiment of making the individual employer liable. But I am certain that when you have made that experiment you will find that you will be led to lengths which some people hardly anticipate. [Cheers.] Let us fully realise where we are going. If you once establish the principle that if a soldier in the army of industry is wounded or dies he is entitled in the one case to a pension, and in the other case that his dependents are to be provided for, you cannot leave the application of that principle to the hazard of chance, as to whether the captain of his company is solvent or insolvent. The liability you recognise rests not upon the ground that the employer is morally responsible; it rests on the ground that this is one of the burdens incidental to the trade, and that it is a matter of general interest that men should not be left unprovided for who have devoted the best of their energies to the carrying on of industries of the country. As a matter of convenience you may make the employer the person whose pocket is in the first instance to be resorted to; but when that pocket is empty, and when the workman who has sustained a great injury is unable to obtain compensation from him, you will have to provide another fund for the purpose. I like to look questions of this kind fairly in the face, and I do not hesitate to say that in my opinion, when we have passed this Bill into law, we shall have practically committed ourselves to a system by which out of State resources you will have to guarantee compensation for accidents. ["Hear, hear!"] I pass from that to say a word on the subject of the introduction of additional safeguards for the prevention of accidents. I was glad to hear the assurance of the Home Secretary last night that whilst he deprecated making the Bill too complicated a Measure, if it were found consistent with not unduly enlarging its area, he would introduce safety provisions, or at any rate keep an open mind on the subject. The point which I would press upon the Government is that they ought to take this opportunity of abolishing once and for all as regards all the industries of the country the doctrine of common employment. ["Hear, hear!"] That doctrine has had a curious history. It was the invention of lawyers. Seventeen years ago, when the first Employers' Liability Bill was passed, the doctrine of common employment was taken for granted by everybody as being a sound and well-founded principle, and it was regarded as rather a heretical thing to throw doubt upon it. But now there is no one so poor as to do it reverence. ["Hear, hear!" and laughter.] No one has adduced a single argument in favour of the maintenance of the doctrine of common employment. ["Hear, hear!"] The Colonial Secretary has said that as regards these selected industries we are getting rid of the doctrine. I do not think that that statement is literally accurate. It is perfectly true that as regards a man in the selected trades who chooses to prefer his claim to compensation under the schedule of this Bill no question of common employment can arise. But there is an important provision in the Bill to which very little attention has been directed, namely, subparagraph B of Sub-section 2, Clause 1—[cheers]—which gives the alternative right to the person injured to pursue, subject to certain conditions, his legal remedy. I confess I do not understand the language of that clause any more than I do astrology. [Laughter.] What is the meaning of "wilful and wrongful act of the employer"? How you are going to draw a line between what the Home Secretary called "gross negligence" and the "wilful act of the employer" I do not know; and as this is one of the matters that have compulsorily to be referred to arbitration before the workman can bring his action in a Court of Law, it seems to me a clause which will give rise to a great deal of unnecessary litigation. Let us suppose a case which will commonly occur. A man is not killed, but is seriously injured by an accident. He loses a finger, an eye, or a limb, but he is not in a condition of incapacity, which alone is contemplated and provided for in the schedule of the Bill. He can work, but he works in a mutilated and crippled condition and at a less remunerative form of employment. As I read the Bill I do not think it makes any provision for that case. But even if it did, the man may believe that he would get a larger solatium by his legal remedy than in this modest amount—"a weekly payment not exceeding 50 per cent of his wages." ["Hear, hear!"] The moment a man goes to law, although he belongs to one of the selected industries, he may be met by the defence of common employment, and if the injury can be shown in any degree to be due to the default of a fellow workman he cannot obtain a remedy. ["Hear, hear!"] I say then that, even as regards the selected trades, my right hon. Friend went beyond what is provided in the Bill when he said that the doctrine of common employment had no application. But as regards the non-selected trades the law remains as it has been for the past 17 years—a scandal and a reproach to the Legislature—["hear, hear!"]—an elaborate series of traps and pitfalls for the unwary litigant, and producing litigation which in proportion to its difficulty and cost is absolutely barren of result. ["Hear, hear!"] By a few words introduced into the Bill the Government may get rid of the doctrine of common employment and confer an incalculable boon upon the large body of workmen who are otherwise excluded from its operation. ["Hear, hear!"] With regard to exclusions from the Bill, I do not deny that there is something to be said for proceeding tentatively in the working out of a matter of this kind; but I cannot understand or appreciate the grounds upon which the Government have proceeded in their discrimination between favoured and unfavoured trades. The main ground alleged is that in selected trades the percentage of accidents is higher than in the others. That I believe is open to doubt. It certainly is very high in the case of certain trades of a dangerous character which are excluded from the scope of the Bill. But I venture emphatically to protest against the use, or rather the abuse, of the doctrine of averages in matters of this kind. It is no consolation to a mine-owner, who has to work a dangerous mine and who is called upon to make good the results of an explosion by which two or three hundred persons are killed, to say that the average cost of this new charge on capital is 1 per cent. of the coal industry of the country. ["Hear, hear!"] But if that is the case as regards the owner, how far stronger is the case as regards the workman who is injured? Here is a man, we will say, a builder, who falls from a scaffold on a building where steam power is not used and breaks his arm or his leg, and is incapacitated from carrying on his business by which he gets his living. The doctrine of common employment stands in the way of his getting anything out of his employer if it is shown that a fellow workman has been guilty of contributory negligence, and he cannot get a halfpenny under the Bill because he does not happen to belong to one of the privileged trades. You go to such a man and say to him, "My poor friend, I am very sorry for you. It is quite true that you have been crippled and mutilated for life, and that your value as an instrument of production has been depreciated to an extent that cannot be estimated. But you are only one case in a thousand. Your more fortunate neighbour next door, who, having sustained a similar injury, has got a pension for life, belongs to a trade where he is one in fifty or in a hundred." [Cheers.] There cannot possibly be any policy or justice in that discrimination. ["Hear, hear!"] I am not making these criticisms in any hostile spirit, because I am anxious if I can, as we all are in respect to this Bill, to make it a complete and workable Measure, and, above all, that it shall not be a Bill which, by introducing new and invidious distinctions between different classes of workmen, could give rise to jealousy and heartburning, and prove anything but a settlement of the great questions which we all wish to settle. [Cheers.] I therefore earnestly trust that the Government will reconsider the exclusion of these trades, some of which, for instance, such as the trade of seamen, are peculiarly dangerous. ["Hear, hear!"] I should like to mention two other points. The first is as to the question, who under the Bill is to be deemed to be an employer—a question which was raised by one of my hon. Friends on this side. Now, Sir, everyone who has had to study this matter with a view to practical legislation has very soon found himself confronted with this difficulty. In our law, if the employer delegates a part of the work which he has contracted to do by contract to another, and allows that other to employ the workmen, between that head employer and the workmen there is no contractual relation whatever. Thus, if you give to the workman a remedy against the employer, he must pursue it against the middleman and not against the head man, for whose behalf and profit the contract is really being carried out. In other words, you are brought face to face with the question of sub-contracting. If this Bill be passed in its present form, it will give an enormous impetus to sub-contracting. We know that sub-contracting already exists to a very considerable extent in mines, where a great deal of the incidental work is done under butty men or gangers—by small gangs of men whom they select and pay. These men are not, in point of law, in the employment of the mine-owner, and any remedy given to them against their employer would only be against this man—I will not call him a man of straw, but a man with no adequate means of making good the compensation which it is your intention to give. You must deal with that question if this Bill is to be a satisfactory Bill, and I venture upon that point to press upon the Government the desirability of incorporating, as they can, I think, without the least change in the structure of their Bill, by a mere addition, the clause we succeeded in introducing into the Employers' Liability Bill of 1893. In that clause, under certain well-defined conditions, the main one of which was that the head employer must have control of the operations or of the premises upon which the work has been carried on, you would make the head employer liable, and not the intermediary alone, whose liability would be of no value whatever to the injured man. There is another point also involving no change whatever in the principle of the Bill, and very little change in its structure. It was brought forward with admirable wealth of apposite illustration by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire. In the first subsection of all, which entitles an injured man to compensation for injury arising from accident, you should either by the introduction of words into that clause, or by definition or, if needed, by a separate and independent clause, import into the scope of the Bill injuries to health which are caused by neglect on the part of the employer to take those sanitary precautions which are essential for the well-being of the workmen. [Cheers.] As my hon. Friend pointed out there are a very large number of cases, particularly in dangerous trades, such as the lead, pottery, and other industries, in which people living in an insidious atmosphere day by day and week by week are slowly poisoned, lose their health, very often become victims of paralysis, and are rendered quite incapable of carrying on industrial operations. These men and these women—for they are very largely women—are as much wounded soldiers who have fallen on one side in the march of this great army of industry as the man who has his arm or his leg broken in one of the trades dealt with by the Bill. [Cheers.] I confess that no Measure to secure compensation is to my mind adequate or satisfactory which does not bring them within this scope. I have confined myself to matters that seemed to me of vital importance, which go down to the very roots of the question, and I end as I began, by saying that I trust that when the Bill reaches the Committee stage we shall find the Government willing to consider and accede to the suggestions, such as those I have ventured to put forward, conceived not in any spirit of hostility to the Bill, but in the honest desire to extend its scope, within such limits as are reasonable and just, and to make it a satisfactory Measure. [Cheers.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight) said it was a great pleasure to him to find himself in accord with the right hon. Gentleman in regard to many of the observations he had made, although he must criticise some of the right hon. Gentleman's arguments. He was satisfied that they were not addressed to the House in any spirit of hostility. The main objection which had been raised to the Bill was that it would impose a burden on the great colliery industry. Hon. Members who represented colliery interests, however, had proceeded on inaccurate data, and upon premises which would not bear the test of even a superficial examination. The calculation of the hon. Member for Gainsborough that the liability thrown upon the colliery owners by this Bill would amount to 2d, a ton, or even more, and would be an almost intolerable burden, was not a calculation upon which the House could act, because no one who had considered the question during the last 10 or 15 years could possibly assume that the existing law was to be allowed to continue to be the standard of the liability of the colliery owners. What they ought to do in order to fairly gauge the real burden imposed on any industry by the Bill was to take the best position which that industry could hope for under the altered legislation which they must expect. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman opposite gave the best terms which the colliery owner could have been asked to expect, and yet not a single Member in the course of that Debate had attempted to fix what would have been the standard of liability imposed by that Bill. That Measure would have put an end to the doctrine of common employment so far as collieries were concerned, it would have made the coal owner liable in every case in which a workman was injured by reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer. He asked hon. Members who might follow him to say how much of the hundreds of thousands of pounds ought to be deducted in the case of colliery proprietors who had a good defence. He did not hesitate to say from his own experience that, taking the standard of liability which would be imposed by the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman and the standard imposed by this Bill, only a fraction of increased liability—it might be 10, 15, or 20 per cent. at the outside—would be due to the fact that the colliery proprietor had to compensate in every case of accident in which the workman had been guilty of contributory negligence. No doubt many hon. Members opposite at the last election were prepared to accept the Bill of the right hon. Member for Fife, and if so to consent to have imposed upon themselves as employers of labour a liability which he believed would be 50, 60, or even 70 per cent. of the liability imposed by this Bill. In order to ascertain what was the real burden, they must contrast the existing state of things with what would have been the change in the law and the increased liability had the Bill of 1893 been passed. A word with reference to the inclusion or exclusion of all trades or the limited inclusion under the present Bill. Here he could not quite agree with the argument of the right hon. Member for East Fife. To his own mind, remembering that the Government were enunciating a principle which, if not altogether new, went further in regard to these trades than the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, it was necessary to proceed with caution. To include all trades at once in this system he believed he could show was impossible. Upon what basis had the Government proceeded? The first broad principle that they had proceeded upon was to include trades that were either dangerous or involved such conditions that legislation had been necessary to control the manner and safeguards under which they were carried out. With regard to engineering works they advanced further. Then they had to consider the practical conditions which affected those industries, and he would take one or two of the most typical matters that had been referred to. Take the building trade. What was the condition of that trade as a whole? Apart from the vast structures reared in London and other large cities by the aid of costly machinery, the bulk of the work done was in relation to comparatively small buildings which did not involve the same elements of danger. Here small employers were for the most part little better off than the foreman and superior workmen who worked on the job, and if at one sweep, without experience of how it would work, they were to include the whole of the building trade, they would simply drag in and put under the conditions of this Bill a class of men who could not combine to protect themselves and ought not to be called upon to insure and pay compensation for injuries of men who were practically in the same position as themselves. Take domestic servants. No Bill would be necessary for domestic servants such as hon. Members would employ. If any of their servants were injured in their employment he was sure they would not allow them to remain without the means of subsistence. But with small people, in the small habitations of our towns, employing one or two servants it was different. It would be ridiculous that persons with incomes varying between £100 and £200 a year should have imposed upon them by statute the liability to compensate servants for accidents that might happen in the course of their ordinary employment. Take the case of small trades—smiths', ironworkers', and carpenters' shops and tens of trades of that kind, in hundreds and thousands of instances they would find they would be obliged, if they included all trades, to bring in persons little better than superior workmen. It was necessary to draw the line somewhere, and accordingly the line was drawn at these trades in which there would not be the same hardship and burden which would be likely to cripple industry and to be a serious detriment to the carrying on of the trades. As to the power of employers of labour in the larger industries to combine and protect themselves, in the shipping trade there existed mutual associations whereby shipowners combined for the purpose of meeting the demands of the workmen and protecting themselves; and with regard to colliery proprietors and other large industries there were the same means of mutual assistance and co-operation. This was not the case with the small employers throughout the length and breadth of the land, so the Government had proceeded on lines which the House might think right or wrong, but which were still intelligible, intended to include dangerous trades, and trades where the power of mutual protection and insurance was readily accessible to those engaged in them, and which would not impose an unreasonable burden on small employers, who were often in no better case than their superior workmen. When in Committee they came to consider whether the actual provisions of Section 2 were sufficient to bring in dangerous trades, the matter would, he was sure, be carefully considered; but in considering the Amendments and the action of the Government with regard to them, it was necessary they should keep in view the principles to which he had referred, that they might not, without experience and foresight, include trades which, in practical working, it would be found undesirable to bring within the scheme and the Bill. Now he came to the main point of the attack of the right hon. Member for Fife. He asked, "Why have you not abolished the doctrine of common employment altogether?" He could not understand the construction he placed on sub-section (3) of Clause 2. He could not imagine the question of common employment arising in a case under that section. If the employer had been guilty of such gross personal negligence as to render him liable to compensate a workman in damages, no question of common employment could possibly arise. But he would not debate points not necessarily for the purpose of the Bill. A great deal had been said which was not well founded in attacking the doctrine of common employment. But he was not there to defend it. Still there was much more to be said for it than his right hon. Friend indicated in his speech. But as regarded the trades included in the Bill, it was abolished altogether. He unhesitatingly submitted that if they had determined to proceed gradually, and if it was necessary not at once to include every trade, but to select trades to which such a principle as this could be safely applied, then, as to the trades included in the Bill, the doctrine of common employment had no more to be considered. Several hon. Gentlemen had asked:—

> "Why, when you contemplate compensation for injuries, have you not at the same time endeavoured to prevent accidents?"

When he remembered the legislation proposed in 1893, it astonished him that such an argument could be used on the other side of the House. ["Hear, hear!"] All that the Bill of 1893 did from this point of view was to abolish the doctrine of common employment and to make the master liable for injury done to a workman as he would have been to a person outside. If it was true that this Bill, in the case of the selected trades, imposed a greater liability on the employer than the Bill of 1893, to that greater extent there was a stronger inducement to prevent accidents, and he did think it was hardly a fair argument for hon. Members opposite to say that by the proposed legislation of 1893 they directed their attention mainly to the prevention of accidents. All they did was to make the master responsible in a greater number of cases. ["Hear, hear!"] The present Government had gone further, and if the trades included under the Bill were dangerous trades, they had applied a stronger preventive against accidents in the proposals now before the House than was contained in the proposals of 1893. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had dwelt a good deal on what might happen in the event of the bankruptcy of an employer. He did not deny that that was a difficult question, but it existed to a great extent at the present time. Employers were just as likely to go bankrupt when an action was brought against them as they would be under the provisions of this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] But that question could not be dealt with as a matter of principle. He did not suppose the House would care to say that the State should provide a fund out of which compensation might be paid to the workman. He did not suppose the House would be prepared to adopt the German system. The question of solvency and ability to pay damages was just one of those chances of fortune to which persons employed in trades must at times be subjected. ["Hear, hear!"] He would be glad if some system could be devised which would afford security to the workman, but it did not seem to be possible to remove all risk that might arise. There was one suggestion he would throw out, though he did not do so on behalf of the Government. It seemed to him that if there was anxiety as to the ability of the employer to continue the weekly payments, an alternative might be inserted by providing for the payment of a lump sum. He heard his hon. Friend the late Solicitor General suggest that in that case the employer might "go bang at once." [Laughter.] But that might happen at the present day, and if an employer could not pay when an accident happened, that was a misfortune which might arise at the present time. ["Hear, hear!"] It seemed to him that the possibility of future insolvency might be met by some such Amendment as he had suggested. He did not think very much reliance could be placed on the argument that there ought to be included in the Bill some provision against injuries arising from dangerous trades. He was a little surprised to hear the hon. Member for Berwickshire claim credit on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Fife for having provided for compensation for injuries arising from employment in dangerous trades, in his Bill of 1893. There was no such provision in the Bill.

*MR. ASQUITH: We assented to it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said the only suggestion was to provide for compensation for injuries to health which could be mitigated or removed by the use of reasonable precautions. But a large number of those injuries arise, not from the neglect of precautions, but from the trade itself; therefore it was no good to suggest that provisions should be included in this Bill for the compensation of workmen who, in the ordinary course of trade, lost their health, when the only suggestion made in the Bill of 1893 was to compensate the workman for loss or injury if it was occasioned by the neglect of reasonable precautions. He would not argue the Bill in reference to such occurrences as the great explosions in mines. He hoped that they would become rarer year by year; but they had to deal with the everyday occurrences and accidents which must arise, and he trusted the House would feel that the Government had endeavoured at any rate to adopt a principle which, whether it were extended or not, would commend itself to those who desired to compensate workmen in the trades included. If, in the course of years, with the better knowledge the House would gain from the working of this Measure, it could be extended, so much the better. If it promoted insurance, it would mean greater security in the trades, for the precautions taken by insurers and insurance companies led to the reduction of accidents. The Government had adopted a principle which they believed to be sound in itself. They had applied it to those industries which, in their judgment, called for an alteration in the law. If they had not gone far enough, the House could amend the actual list of trades to which it ought to apply. Certainly, in his opinion, it ought not to apply generally without distinction to all employers. The Bill was an honest attempt to deal with the question, and he sincerely hoped the House would continue the discussion on the Committee stage in the same spirit which had been displayed on the present occasion, and that they would be able to see at the end of the Session a useful Measure on the Statute Book, which would not only prevent accidents, but also compensate those who were injured through no fault of their own. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR J. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich) said he could wish to see the Bill amended in more points than one, but it was his intention to vote for the Second Reading, because he considered it, on the whole, a great advance on any proposal that had hitherto come from the Party opposite. He also supported the Bill because, during the last 16 years, the firm with which he was connected had paid compensation exactly in the way the Bill proposed. ["Hear, hear!"] He had to congratulate the House on the tone in which the Home Secretary had met what they had to say in the way of criticism. Whenever they heard the right hon. Gentleman they listened to a man who gave them the impression that, whether they differed from him or not, he was kindly disposed towards them, and would meet their objections if they were not opposed to the principles on which he based his political conduct. "Hear, hear!"] Unfortunately that was not so in the case of all speakers from the Treasury Bench. ["Hear, hear!"] For the last 16 years his firm had been paying compensation exactly in the way proposed by the Bill. During that time they had not spent any money whatever in legal expenses under the Employers' Liability Act, and they had paid compensation in every case of injury without asking who was at fault, the workman or the employer. Moreover, they had never insured, for the reason that they expected the insurance company would pay as little as possible, and fight every case when there was a chance of defeating the workman. They desired that no such intermediary should come between them and their employees, on the ground that good relationship between them was extremely valuable and should be maintained. ["Hear, hear!"] He thought it worth while to mention that the legal definition of an accident is that the workman should be kept from his employment by his injuries 48 hours. In every case a report had been made to him personally by the head of the department in which the accident occurred, with a view to steps being taken to prevent a repetition of the accident. Some of the accidents arose from extraordinary causes. In one case a nut an inch and a-quarter across and $\frac{3}{8}$ inch deep caught a workman by his cotton jacket and took him round a shaft. During the four years 1881-4, the first years under the Employers' Liability Act, the number of accidents reported was 13 per 1,000 men per annum; but as a result of the pains to secure prevention the number was brought down to 6 per 1,000 per annum in the four years 1893-6. With respect to the proper method of dealing with drunken workmen, fifteen years ago his firm offered a reward for sobriety and regular attendance in the shape of a week's holiday every year and a week's pay, and at that time 43 per cent. of men were steady enough to earn the reward. Since then the number had risen to 98 per cent. ["Hear, hear!"] Although the hours of employment had been shortened from twelve to eight, this giving four hours a day longer for drinking, if the men were inclined to indulge in it, they were now far soberer than formerly. With regard to sub-contractors he agreed with Mr. Asquith that they were not as careful as the head employers, and for that reason, as well as for the reason that the sub-contractor was, as a rule, not able to pay compensation, he should be very glad to see the head contractor made responsible for the neglect of the sub-contractor. It was generally conceded that for this year at any rate agriculturists were to be left out of the scope of the Bill. He would like to point out that in the case of firms like his own, while they had to contribute to the maintenance in the workhouse of agricultural labourers who, often in consequence of receiving miserably small wages had been unable to provide for old age, they would have to maintain other agriculaural labourers who were accidentally injured and were unable to obtain compensation through the operation of the doctrine of common employment, and in addition would have this new liability thrown upon them of paying compensation in every case at their own works. If the accidents to agricultural labourers were small the liability also would be small. He very much feared that agriculture was left out mainly for the reason that the Tory Party considered that nobody engaged in agriculture ought to be obliged to put brains into their business. [Laughter.] The chief blots in the existing law mentioned by the hon. Member for East Fife would, he hoped, be dealt with in Committee by way of amendments. The Bill was described by its authors as a serious and earnest attempt to diminish litigation, but he would like to point out that in the first schedule it was provided that weekly payments made to a defendant might be revised every three months. A Bill which offered arbitration four times a year during the whole of a man's life could not fairly be described as an attempt to diminish litigation, for he looked upon arbitration as only another name for litigation. ["Hear, hear!"] Fear had been expressed that the Bill would tend to the extinction of small employers. He should be extremely sorry if that result came about. Small employers were a very valuable part of society. Their existence was an incentive to workmen to strive to improve their position, and they were a bulwark against that threatened condition of things in which every man would be either the paid servant of a limited company or would have to go to another country to earn his living. It would be a mischievous thing if all the trades of the country got into the hands of enormous organisations. The reason why it was feared the Bill would tend to extinction of small employers was, that small employers would find it impossible to insure against the liabilities imposed upon them. He should be grateful if he could be informed upon that point. With respect to the definition of "dependents," he had no doubt that if the Government would consider the matter for a moment they would allow a brother and a sister to come under the definition if it could be shown to the satisfaction of the arbitrator that that brother and sister had suffered loss by the injury or death of the workman. It appeared to him that, under the Bill as it stood, it was not necessary for the dependent to show that he or she suffered any loss through the injury or death of the workman. If that was so, they came to this absurd result. The definition of dependent under the Fatal Accidents Act 1846, included stepfather and stepmother, as well as grandfather and grandmother; stepson and stepdaughter, as well as son and daughter; so that if a stepson ran away and concealed himself as a workman in a factory, and met with an injury, his well-to-do stepmother, who suffered not one jot by the injury, might receive compensation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I think the schedule is clear, that under the Act of 1846 compensation can only be given where pecuniary loss is sustained. It is not intended for relations who do not suffer pecuniary injury.

*SIR J. BRUNNER said what he wished to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman was that nobody who did not suffer pecuniary loss should get compensation, and that anybody who did suffer should get compensation. He should support the Second Reading, because he considered the Bill was a considerable step in advance of previous legislation, because it tended to a thoroughly wholesome result, but mainly because for 16 years his firm had paid compensation on the lines it proposed.

*MR. EDWARD GOULDING (Wilts, Devizes) believed that this Measure would be received with great satisfaction by the working class, and especially by those members of that class who would benefit under its provisions, for whether in its aim at establishing compensation for accidents or in its endeavours to reduce the worry and uncertainty of litgation, it marked a great departure in legislation of that kind. The chief fault he had to find with the Bill was that so many trades were excluded from its operation. The Secretary for the Colonies, to whom so many were grateful for his powerful advocacy of social reforms, had said that the right to compensation of any person injured in the ordinary course of employment was a public right and a national obligation. Representing an agricultural constituency he claimed that right for them. This Parliament had already legislated for agriculture through the Agricultural Rates Act, which relieved the landlord and the tenant, but, so far, it had hardly done anything for the agricultural labourer, than whom there was no more deserving or law-abiding member of the community. ["Hear, hear!"] After a close study of the speeches of the Unionist Leaders during his election campaign he assured the agricultural labourers in his constituency that he would support a real Employers' Liability Bill, but what excuse could he make to them, now that they were excluded from the operation of this Measure, when the men in the towns, who often earn ten times their wage have the benefit of this Measure? The lot of agricultural labourers was not a happy one, and there was no wonder that the best of them migrated to the towns. Were not the Government by this Bill adding an inducement to them to continue in that direction? As an argument for the exclusion of agriculture from the Bill, it was said that the accidents from which those engaged in agricultural pursuits suffered were few. Far more accidents occurred in agriculture than people imagined; but even if the accidents were few, the premium paid by farmers to insure against them would certainly be small. He had spoken to many big farmers in regard to this subject, and he did not find them at all hostile to being included in the Bill. He earnestly appealed to the Government to give favourable consideration to the Amendment which would be proposed to include agriculturists in the Bill. If they did bring that class within the scope of the Measure, and so helped to remove the cause of friction that exists between master and man, he was persuaded that the oldest, and by far the greatest and most important, industry in the country would receive a great impetus.

Sir JAMES JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street) thought that the Government had every reason to be satisfied with the manner in which their Bill had been received in every part of the House. In his opinion, no more important Bill had been introduced during the last 50 years—["hear, hear!"]—and if he had been told some time ago that a Conservative Government would introduce a Measure of such a character he would have been staggered by the information. There was more socialism pure and simple in the Bill than in any Bill which had been submitted during the last half-century, and many of the arguments used in favour of it could be equally well applied to any Measure brought in to provide food, clothing, and medical attendance for the working classes. He was not averse to accidents being provided for, but there were many ways of making that provision. Those who, like himself, had been associated with a dangerous trade knew that for the last 25 years the workmen had been most anxious to make provision for themselves and their families in case of accidents in their occupation. They saw that exemplified in various ways. In his own county, and in other parts of the country they had Miners' Permanent Relief Funds established, which had been of incalculable benefit to those connected with them, not only for the assistance they received in the shape of financial payments, but for the training they had afforded in self-government, and the inducements they had offered to look into all those financial questions. He thought these men had been qualified to a very great degree by these funds to exercise their citizenship in a way that had been of real advantage to the country. He certainly would not like to see these funds disappear. He was not prepared to say, like some of his hon. Friends who had spoken in this Debate, that this Bill would be the death blow to these funds. He hoped it might not. It was quite possible it might be the death blow so far as the owners' contributions were concerned, but as the Bill did not comprise everything which at the present time was dealt with by these funds, he thought there was still a large sphere open to them to develop and continue the usefulness that they were now carrying on. So far as he was concerned, he could not say that he objected to the principle of this Bill. As he had said, he did not object to compensation for accidents. He expected, however, that when the Government brought in a Bill of this kind the least they would have done would have been to make some sort of provision for accidents caused by the act of God, with which employers as employers had no more to do than any other member of the community. He was surprised that they should make an employer responsible for an accident caused to a man by his own negligence or carelessness. He thought that was going a step beyond what might be reasonably expected. He thought the Bill was in a very crude state, and if he were asked to deal with any particular part of it, he confessed he would have a difficulty in finding a single part of its details with which he perfectly agreed. He was glad to find that the Government preserved an open mind, and were prepared to consider the questions that had arisen in the course of the Debate in a liberal and reasonable way. So far as he was concerned, and he believed so far as hon. Members who represented great artisan and mining constituencies were concerned, the Government would get every assistance in trying to make this Bill a perfect Measure so far as it could be, provided they accepted those Amendments which would be proposed on the sound and right lines. He agreed with the Attorney General when he said that if they increased the cost of accidents to an employer, undoubtedly the employers would use more diligence in preventing risks of accident. He believed that it would lead to greater strictness and more careful supervision on the part of managers, and one effect of this Bill upon employers would be that if they saw any workman negligent or careless, and doing anything which was likely to tend to or promote an accident, they would certainly discharge him in order that it might be a lesson to those who remained. In a most dangerous mine of his own, a short time ago, a box of matches was found, and the next morning all the men were carefully examined, and three of them were found to have pipes and tobacco and matches. They were prosecuted, and he thought it was his duty to prosecute them in order to show that conduct of that kind was not only injurious to themselves, but to those with whom they were associated. Suppose an explosion had taken place in the mine, he scarcely thought it could have been said that it was owing to the negligence of the employer. There was a great difficulty in a mineowner covering himself even by insurance from all the risks under this Bill. There was no insurance company that he was aware of would accept a greater risk for explosion than £5,000. £5,000 was a very small amount when they considered what might happen by an explosion. They had had disasters in this country where 400 men had lost their lives. At £200 per man that would mean £80,000. There were very few owners who could look with any degree of complacency upon a risk of that kind. He confessed he was somewhat amazed at the calm with which some hon. Members, who practically did not suffer to any degree under those risks, discussed this question. He had had careful examinations made into the cost to the coal industry, and he was bound to admit that it was most difficult to estimate what would be the actual effect of this Measure financially. Allusion had been made on the previous night to Mr. Merivale, Professor at the Mining College, Newcastle, who stated that compensation would represent something like two-thirds of a penny per ton. He had had the figures carefully gone over, and to give the House a little illustration of the loose and lax way in which the calculation had been made, he would point out one or two things in connection with it. Mr. Merivale said there were 700,000 persons employed in and about mines. As a matter of fact there were 726,000 persons. He next assumed that there were 170 per thousand cases of partial disablement, with an average duration of four weeks. But Lancashire and Cheshire's experience was 180 per thousand, and the average duration was 4¾ weeks. As to permanent disablement he assumed that there were eight cases per thousand per annum employed, equal to a disablement of not quite two years. Lancashire and Cheshire's experience showed that there were 4½ cases per thousand, but that the disablement period was 3½ years. Then as to the deaths. Professor Merivale assumed there were 1,100 deaths per annum. In Lancashire and Cheshire for the five years ending 1895 there were 1,457 deaths per annum. He had had an opportunity of seeing that day Sir Wm. Lewis, who probably knew as much about the South Wales coal trade as any man in the country, and he assured him that it would cost something like close upon 3d. per ton in South Wales. That, of course, was without taking into consideration the quantity of coals consumed in the collieries, and Professor Merivale had made no allowance whatever on that point. Adopting Mr. Merivale's figures of 13s. per week for disablement and £200 for death, the amount charged to the trade would be:—Partial disablement, £416,475; permanent disablement, £386,464; deaths, £291,400; or a total of £1,094,339, or on the total output of 1896 1·34d. per ton. If the full compensation provided for by the Bill was taken it would represent £1,652,450, or on the total output 2·02d. per ton. He admitted, however, that they could not make an accurate calculation which could be thoroughly relied on to suit the whole of the country. The Attorney General used an extraordinary argument in reply to the late Home Secretary in alluding to the difference between the calculation that they made as to cost and what they actually bore at the present time. He said that under the Bill of the late Home Secretary, if that Bill had been passed, they would have paid almost as much as they would pay under the present Bill. He failed to gather from the Attorney General how he made that out. All that they paid at the present time for insurance against accidents, including explosions up to £5,000, was 1-16th per cent., and he believed that under the Bill of the late Home Secretary it would have been one-fourth per cent. Under the present Bill they would not get their insurance effected for less than probably 1½ or 2 per cent. For the Attorney General to say that to compensate for all accidents, whether employers had anything to do with them or not, would make very little difference to what would have been done by the Bill of the late Home Secretary—which compensated no accidents except such as could be shown to have occurred from the negligence of a fellow-workman—he thought was absurd. The present Bill would in every way put a much heavier burden upon the mining industry than would have been done by the Bill of the late Home Secretary. He was not one of those who believed that even 2½d. or 3d. per ton extra would ruin the coal trade of the country. It would have to be paid by somebody—the consumer, the employer, or the workman—possibly by them all. But in Northumberland and Durham, where a large proportion of the coal was exported, and where they came into direct competition with foreign producers, who were fighting them in every market that they had access to, he was not sure that they would be able to make the consumer pay any of it. Did they think that a considerable portion of this charge would not come from wages? Did they think that the coal owners, when they were treating with their men, would not bring forward the argument that they had got an additional burden of 3d., or 2d., or 1d. to pay? They had always done it, and consequently this Bill would be a serious charge upon wages. With regard to the exclusions of the Bill, he failed to see why the Government had adopted their present method of giving exclusions. He would rather have seen every industry included; but small employers should have the benefit of exemption if exemption were thought to be necessary. He was surprised that shipowners should be exempted. Shipowners paid no poor rates whatever. All the widows that were made in the shipping industry had to be supported by other people. He was of opinion that when Measures of this kind were accepted by the House, everybody should feel the burden of them. ["Hear, hear!"] As to bankruptcies, he quite agreed that many large employers in dangerous trades would have to consider whether it was wise not to limit their liability under the liability law. He defied anyone to calculate what would be the liability of the coal owners under this Bill. He hoped the Government would be disposed in Committee to accept some clause which would enable employers and workmen in case of need to insist upon some guarantee from a reliable and respectable insurance company. He thought there was very little difference in this Bill from the German proposals. In his opinion it was not so liberal to employers. In Germany the sick fund paid for the first 13 weeks all the expense of an accident, and that was a very large protection and a very liberal allowance to the employer, but in this Bill there were only two weeks, and then they were not to be allowed to revise the matter for three months, so that practically a workman would get two weeks' allowance, and then he could not be compelled to go before the doctor till three months were over. He thought a good case would be made out for contributions from the State, and for a contribution from the royalty owners. There were precedents for such a course—namely, when the Poor Law was extended to Ireland in 1835, and in 1877, when lead mines were, for the first time, made chargeable to the Poor rates. These were points, however, which could be discussed in Committee. If, in the course of the Debate, the Government found that so many difficult questions had arisen that they would have to withdraw the Bill this Session, he hoped they would bring it forward in another year. He did not want to escape from the principle of the Bill, because he thought it was a good one; but when they were making this new departure—a new departure with such vast possibilities—he thought it was nothing but right that the country should have an opportunity of considering the whole question on its merits, and that they should have some opportunity of consulting their constituents upon it.

Mr. THOMAS RICHARDSON (Hartlepool), as an employer affected by the Bill, congratulated the Government on having brought in a Measure which promised so effectively to grapple with a complex problem. The Government had also given evidence, by the concessions already made, of their desire to improve the Bill. In his judgment the Bill was, no doubt, a long step in the direction of industrial socialism, though he had no doubt that coal owners and others affected by it would find some way out of the difficulties which confronted them. As a rule, works which were full of machinery were found to be the most dangerous places, but, judging by the discussion, the opinion appeared to be entertained that they were about the safest places a man could be in. He could only account for this impression by the fact that in engineering works 2s. 6d. per cent. of the wages paid would cover the liability under the Bill. He had looked over the number of accidents in his own industry during the past ten years, and had applied the provisions of the Bill to them. This was the result. The total number of accidents during the ten years was 94, five of them, unfortunately, fatal. Out of the remainder 21 men were off work one week and less; three were off three days; 22 men were off two weeks; and 46 had an average loss of nine weeks. Not a single man had been off for a whole year. He believed that in the engineering works the amount to be paid did not reach a halfpenny per man a week, and this was not likely to come out of the wages. He believed that employers of labour were only too willing to pay compensation to the men injured in their works, provided they were sure that the money went in the right direction. What had annoyed employers was the fact that the money should go in aid of litigation. It had been stated that out of every £1 in compensation, on an average 15s. had been contributed to the lawyer. In the industry with which he was connected, they had always been able to steer clear of litigation, and he did not think that under the Bill many employers would be frightened into insuring against the accidents that might occur. The right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean spoke about the necessity of safeguards. He hoped that when the Bill was in Committee hon. Members would remember that the works which were full of machinery were not the most dangerous places, that they had already suffered in consequence of the interference of inspectors under the Factories Acts. The inspectors stipulated that the employers must put a certain guard on machinery —a provision which put the employer to a great deal of useless expense. In many cases these guards on machinery had led to accidents which in some cases were rather serious. The right hon. Baronet also referred to the question of doctors; but there was no need to be in a hurry about that subject. Any man injured in his own works was immediately removed on an ambulance to the hospital, and was attended there by the hospital doctor; but in the case of trivial accidents the man was treated at home, and, besides, nearly every works had a doctor of their own. If neither of those doctors was available, there was the doctor under the Factory and Workshops Act who visited workshops periodically. As to the Friendly Societies, he assured the House that there was no fear of their being ruined by the Bill in any way. So far from young fellows joining these societies with the idea of making a provision in the case of sickness, the idea was far from their minds; their idea was that they would not come to want, and they joined these societies on the persuasion of their friends. He was quite sure that there was nothing in the Bill that would at all injure, much less ruin, the Friendly Societies. He had great pleasure in giving his support to the Bill, for he agreed that it was one possessing enormous advantages for the working classes of this country. He joined other hon. Members in the hope that it might be possible—if not now, then at some future time—to include other industries within its scope, for he believed that, although, as he had said, the Measure would be of enormous advantage to the working classes, in practice it would be found not to be a serious matter for the employers. ["Hear, hear!"]

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER after the usual interval,

*MR. C. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck) said he did not think the Government had dealt with the question in a very satisfactory manner. To differentiate in the way they had between different classes of workmen and to create distinct privileges before the law for one class as compared with another seemed rather a retrograde step. The main object for which the working classes had been striving of late years was to secure as far as possible equality of right, opportunity, and treatment before the law, and no one had yet attempted to show that the present Bill brought this about. On all sides there was a general consensus of opinion—and he admitted that this was the boldest step in the direction of collectivism that any Government had yet ventured to take—[Ministerial cheers]—that the Government would have to go further than they had already done. Many persons thought that when the present Government came to deal with this question their Bill would apply both to domestic servants and shop assistants. He could conceive no reason either in justice or equity for the exclusion of many industries that were excluded from the operation of the Bill, and particularly the building trade. One of the organs that supported the Government and circulated largely in the north of England, The Newcastle Chronicle, had described the Bill as an accident-promoting and wage-decreasing Bill. Whether that were so or not, no one could doubt that German experience tended to show, notwithstanding all that had been said by the Home Secretary and the Colonial Secretary, that since the adoption of universal insurance in Germany, accidents had been on the increase. That might be nothing more than a coincidence, but there the fact stood. According to official documents issued from the Foreign Office, the number of accidents reported during 1895 was 75,527 as against 69,719 in 1894, of which 6,448 were fatal and 1,706 produced an entire incapacity for work. It was not surprising that accidents should increase, because under such arrangements as were proposed in the Bill, compensation would be paid automatically, and there would be no incentive to inquire into the cause of the accident, and such inquiries enabled preventive measures to be taken. There would be no inducement to carefulness on the part of either workman or the employer. He did not think that this Bill would get rid of litigation. He agreed with what the Colonial Secretary said in 1880, that where there was a legal remedy the way was opened to litigation; and under this Bill there was every inducement to the employer to go to litigation in the Arbitration Court. There would be many questions as to whether the injured workman came within the Act, and as to the extent of the compensation. The employer knew that in any case the compensation given could not exceed 50 per cent. of the workman's wages, and the workman would be infinitely worse off than under the Act of 1880, because no compensation would be paid until the Court had given its decision. As to the cost of working the Bill, the estimate of the Home Secretary was much too modest. In 1880 the present Colonial Secretary estimated the cost on the mining industry of the Act of that year at one farthing per ton, and added that the cost would be ten times greater if compensation were given for all accidents. He preferred that estimate of 1880; and an additional burden of 2d. per ton. on the coal trade of Northumberland would, in its present state, spell ruin. Of the coal produced in Northumberland 80 per cent. was sent abroad to compete with foreign coal, and it was not likely, therefore, that the increased cost of production would come out of the consumers' pockets. A large portion of it, at least, would be defrayed out of wages. Experience proved that where industrial legislation increased the cost of production, wages had been reduced. Even if the modest estimate of the cost put forward by the Home Secretary were true, there was reason to fear that wages would be affected. In Committee he should propose an Amendment providing that the coal owners should be entitled to recoup themselves for the increased cost of production involved by the Bill from the rates now charged by royalty-owners. ["Hear, hear!"] At the present time they were bearing a charge in the shape of mining royalties of over five millions per annum; and he thought that as royalty owners were directly interested in the development of their mining royalties they ought to have some share of the increased charge that would be thrown upon the coal industry. It had also been said that the Labour representatives had accepted the principle of the Bill, though it contained a provision for contracting out, although they had rejected the Bill of 1893, because contracting out had been inserted in it in another place. But contracting out was not the main principle of this Bill, and as he had never seen any reason for changing his opinion in regard to contracting out he should certainly put down an Amendment to strike that provision out of the Bill. He looked upon the main principle of the Bill—the principle of giving compensation for all accidents as a sound principle; and he, therefore, would not put the House to the trouble of dividing against the Second Reading. But he was bound to say that he viewed the provisions of the Bill with very mixed feelings indeed, and, in his opinion, having regard to all its details, it was less favourable to the working classes than the Bill of the late Home Secretary.

*SIR ALFRED HICKMAN (Wolverhampton, W.) said that as an employer he desired to warmly congratulate the Home Secretary and the Colonial Secretary upon the Bill. He fully recognised that it would lay a serious burden on some industries, especially the coal industry; but as a coal proprietor he approved of the Bill, and accepted his share of the burden, because he believed the tendency of the Bill would be to prevent litigation. ["Hear, hear!"] Employers did not grudge their workmen some provision in cases of accident, but what they objected to was that they should have to pay in legal expenses two or three times as much as the injured workmen received in the way of compensation. He regarded as most important the provision that, in the case of total disablement, payment of the compensation should be made in instalments. If the money were paid in a lump sum it would soon be dissipated; but by being paid in instalments the injured workman was prevented from becoming a charge on the community; and employers would not be exposed to the opprobrium of having men disabled in their service on the parish or going about the streets begging. The late Home Secretary had unfavourably contrasted the Bill with the Bill which he himself had introduced. He should like to submit both Measures to a very simple and plain test. The Report of the Inspector of Mines in his district showed that during last year there had been 39 fatal accidents. Of those two only could have been dealt with under the Bill of the late Home Secretary, while the whole 39 would have been covered by the present Measure. ["Hear, hear!"] The right hon. Gentleman also objected to the Bill because it did not tend to prevent accidents. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to prevent accidents under his own Bill by abolishing the doctrine of common employment. But he failed to see how making the employer responsible for the default of the fellow workmen would make the fellow workmen more careful. On the contrary, a workman would be less inclined to be careful if he felt that any fellow workman injured by his recklessness would be fully compensated. ["Hear, hear!"] He asserted that in the interest of the workman, in the interest of the employer, and in the interest of the community at large this Bill was beyond all question a better Measure than the Bill of the late Home Secretary. It had been said that the Bill was inimical to the friendly societies and trade unions. He believed it would be a great assistance to those bodies in relieving them of much of their burdens, and in leaving them free to deal with questions of sick relief and old-age pensions for their members. The hon. Member for St. Helens said that it was unfair to burden the employer with the consequences of the workman's own act and fault. That was true as a matter of abstract justice, but as an employer he would rather deal with those few cases which might arise under those circumstances than he would have the element of uncertainty introduced where the question of contributory negligence might be made a matter which would lead to litigation. An industry that would not bear the natural burdens that pertained to it was an industry that was not worth carrying on. He had said that he was in favour of this Bill, but he was not prepared to say that it was a perfect Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] There were

Amendments which he hoped would be accepted by the Home Secretary in Committee. He thought the Bill ought to be extended to a large number of trades which were at present excluded. As to the question of malingering, there was no doubt that in many cases half wages without work would be more acceptable than full wages with work; in many trades the men were fully employed at one period of the year and not at another, and it would happen that half wages on the basis of full employment would be more than a man could earn when employment was only partial. In that respect there would be at any rate a great temptation to malinger. He thought that provisions in regard to the men regularly reporting themselves to a doctor in case of illness were absolutely necessary. Such provisions and regulations were found to be necessary in friendly societies, and in workmen's clubs, and a man had to report himself to a doctor, or to the colliery surgeon every week, and get a note before he was entitled to his pay. Then there was a provision that if a man was permanently injured he should be entitled to a certain weekly payment, but that arrangement in the case of the widow of a man who was killed was done away with. He submitted that it was twenty times more important in the case of a poor woman who was left helpless than in the case of the man himself. He hoped the Home Secretary would consider the suggestion that the payments should be made to the widow by instalments. In the case of the man himself, he thought there ought to be a provision by which he could accept a lump sum instead of the instalments, as such a sum might be useful as capital in starting a man in a small business. He concluded by cordially accepting the Bill, which he believed was the most beneficent piece of legislation for the working classes of this country which had been passed—certainly during this century. ["Hear, hear!"]

*Mr. J. W. LOGAN (Leicester, Harborough) said the hon. Member for Derby had declared that this Bill was not satisfactory, because it did not provide for the prevention of accidents, but the hon. Member himself did not adduce one single argument in support of his Amendment. The hon. Member said that this Bill would destroy all thrift among the working classes, and set the trades union leaders to stir up strife among the working classes. He was surprised that the hon. Gentleman should have such a bad opinion of the working men. The hon. Member had also said that this Bill would have the effect of destroying many charities and valuable institutions which existed. All he could say was that if the effect of the Bill would be to prevent the working people from placing reliance on charity, he for one would most heartily welcome it. He wished to see the working classes loathe and despise charity, and there was no more certain way of inculcating thrift than to teach them to do so. He thought it was but bare justice that the man who was maimed should look to the industry in which he was maimed for his maintenance. ["Hear, hear!"] When he heard the hon. Gentleman speaking on behalf of charity he was reminded of what was said by one of the deepest thinkers of this country:—

> "The one ordered sacrifice, is to do justice; and it is the last we are ever inclined to do—anything rather than that. As much charity as you choose, but no justice. Nay, you will say, 'Charity is greater than justice.' Yes, it is greater; it is the summit of justice; it is the temple of which justice is the foundation. But you cannot have the top without the bottom; you cannot build upon charity."

He thought the Government had taken one of the best steps they could to insure greater safety to the working clases by providing that the pecuniary responsibility for accidents should rest upon the shoulders of the employer. He did not think for a moment that the money which would have to be provided would come out of wages, and he believed that in the long run the effect of the Bill would be to improve the producing power of the men of this country. But supposing the money necessary to pay this compensation were to come out of the profits, he would point out that the amount of profit upon which income tax was paid in 1881 was 255 millions, while in 1895 it was no less a sum than 336 millions. Therefore, it could, if necessary, stand an additional charge. The figures relating to industrial profits for 1895 were ample justification for this Bill. Even if the money necessary to be found should come out of the profits of trade, he thought this Measure was justified, and he believed a more liberal or juster arrangement could not be made for the rank and file of workmen. With such a record of the paupers before us in this country as the records showed, they ought cheerfully to welcome such an attempt as the Government were now making to provide for the rank and file of their great industrial army. ["Hear, hear!"] Mr. Bainbridge had suggested that the Bill would put a 2d. burden on the cost of coal. Even if that were so, he would suggest to Mr. Bainbridge that the colliery proprietors should help to make the royalty owner, to whom they paid from 5d. to 6d. a ton, contribute towards the burden imposed by this Bill. It was seldom indeed he had the great pleasure of congratulating right hon. Gentlemen opposite upon any efforts of theirs on behalf of the toilers of this country. He hoped they would believe him when he said that he was absolutely certain that had this Bill been brought in by hon. Members upon the Opposition side, a great many hon. Gentlemen opposite would find themselves compelled to oppose it. [Laughter.] He congratulated the Government on having brought in the Bill, because it contained the right principle that the employer should be responsible for the man who met with an injury. He welcomed the Bill because he desired to see employers as concerned for their men as they were for their engines and their horses. And if throughout the Bill had been as sympathetic as it was in the first sub-section, he would have nothing but praise to say of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] He hoped that the Government would accept Amendments which would remedy some of the defects, which were many, of the Bill. The one as to the weekly allowances would need consideration. Then Sub-section (3) of Clause 1 would lead to a vast amount of litigation and work for the lawyers. In his own business as a contractor they sublet a considerable amount of work, and provision should be made that the principal contractor could not shift his responsibility under the Bill to any sub-contractor he might employ. However the Government might deal with these Amendments, he should support the Bill, because of the principle it contained that compensation should be paid to the workman in all cases. He wanted to see that principle placed on the Statute Book. He said so with a full sense of what that led to. When it became recognised that every workman would have to be compensated, the State would have to step in and guarantee that the money was paid to men injured, and the State would be amply justified in doing so, and would be fully compensated for it by remembering that safeguarding the working classes and making them more efficient instruments of production was one of the first things the State should do. He objected to the provision in Sub-section (a), by which a man was fined two weeks' wages because he had been injured. A large percentage of the working classes lived from hand to mouth, he was sorry to say; they had no available balance of wages, and the amount that they received did not admit of their putting by anything. Recognising, as this Bill did, the great principle that the man who was doing his duty should not suffer from having done it, he was surprised that the Bill should in this section propose to plunge a man into difficulties for doing his duty. Supposing a man were injured for six or eight weeks, for the first two weeks he would receive nothing, and, consequently, would run into debt; the next four weeks before he was able to work again he would receive half his wages, which would not be sufficient to enable him to pay all his current expenses, and the consequence was that he would run further into debt, with the result that when he was fit to go to work he would have a weight of debt hanging around his neck which it would take him some time to remove. Therefore he was sorry that the Government had not recognised that the responsibility of the employer should commence before the end of 14 days. In common with many others, he was sorry that the Government had not yet seen their way to extend the Measure, especially to horse drivers, more of whom were killed than engine drivers. But, having made this start, they would not be able to stop, and he had no desire that the Government should stop. ["Hear, hear!"] It was in the interests of the Tory Party, as well as in the interests of the working classes, that they should extend the scope of the Bill. It was not from a party point of view that he urged them to increase their popularity in the country. He could assure them that they would receive from him no captious opposition, because he regarded the principle contained in the first sub-section of the Bill so valuable in the interests of the working classes throughout the country that it should not be lightly thrown aside. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said the Bill was important for the workman; first, in securing his safety—the primary consideration in any Employers' Liability Bill—and, secondly, in securing compensation for him, which was a great boon if it were certain and assured, and not illlusory and misleading, and if these results could be gained without imposing such undue burdens upon an industry as to divert it, by which the workman might suffer, and he hoped whatever was done good relations between employers and workmen would be strengthened, for this was economic, and well worth some obligations being accepted by employers. He remarked that the first point the House had to accept was that this Bill would have some effect in increasing the cost of production. A great deal had been said about the coal industry, but that was only one of a great many industries that would be affected. He knew no more difficult matter than to say where the increased cost would ultimately rest. In the case of a monopoly the consumer could be made to pay, but where there was free competition he defied anyone to say where it would fall—on the business, or profits, or wages, or upon the consumer. He did not hesitate, however, to say that in this case some proportion of it might fall on wages. ["Hear, hear!"] Therefore it was for the working classes to consider whether the effect of the Bill would be entirely beneficial. ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill made a most important new departure. For 300 years the basis of liability in business had been negligence in some form or other, though negligence had been held by an excrescence in the law in some cases not to constitute liability—he referred to the doctrine of common employment, which created a manifest injustice in the legal fiction that a manager in a superior position was the colleague of a man who had no control or power at all, which would have no real foundation since the introduction of the factory system. Whatever else was done, the abolition of the doctrine of common employment should have been one of the first steps in the improvement of the law. ["Hear, hear!"] Again, under the Act of 1880 a great injustice had been perpetrated on the working man by the necessity of givng notice of an injury within a specified time, which had led to benevolence for a time and then to repudiation. There was also the question of sub-contracting, and there again there was room for remedy. He ventured to say that the remedying of these points was even more urgent than the granting of compensation—["hear, hear!"]—because they disturbed and rendered most unjust the relations between employer and employed, and so caused injury and loss to both. The Bill passed over negligence as an element of liability—even contributory negligence, he thought, and possibly, according to the working of the Bill, even wilful neglect or default—a concession for which he saw no reason. It substituted for these compensation, and introduced into the law of Employers' Liability two terms unknown before, compensation and insurance. He admitted that the Bill had one advantage. It would do something to decrease litigation. The Act of 1880 had been most unfortunate in that respect, but the cases under it had chiefly arisen on the doctrine of common employment, and on the absence of notice of the injury, and, if these defects had been removed, there would have been a great decrease in litigation. But that was to be changed, and what was the new principle? It was that if in the course of a lawful trade, and without any wrongful act or default in the employer or his agents, machinery was set in motion, the person who did this must assume, without practically much limitation, all the consequences of it. Would all businesses survive this additonal burden? They had not only to deal with to-day. Times were good now, but there might be a return to the condition of things experienced between 1890 and 1895, and therefore it was necessary to consider carefully whether, in the stress of both national and international competition, and in times not so prosperous as now, an additional burden, so variously estimated, could safely be borne by the industries of this country. ["Hear, hear!"] Although large concerns might be able to deal with bad times, smaller businesses felt them much more. The latter might find it difficult to insure, or might have to incur large premiums, and the House must take care not to run undue risk of destroying businesses of that class, which were the backbone of the trade of this country, especially in London. Great effort should be made to prevent the universal creation of limited concerns and Trusts, for if the effect was to kill the smaller businesses it would have a most lamentable effect on the trade of the country, while the experience of America as to Trusts and monopolies was a strong warning. Did the Bill assure compensation to the workman with the certainty that was desired? Was the basis of the Bill wide enough to make it safe and permanent? In other words, was the base of the Bill wide enough to be effective? Because if it were not so it would be illusory. What was to happen in the case of the insolvency of an employer? And were the payments to the insured to be preferential in bankruptcy like wages? The Attorney General suggested that instead of payments by instalments cash should be paid at once. Would not that precipitate a disaster? ["Hear, hear!"] He believed that the only possible solution ultimately would be the security of the State. [Cheers.] The inevitable outcome was State assistance, or, like the German system, the security of employers' associations. We must be careful of putting burdens on particular businesses to their prejudice and to the disappointment of the employés, who might find, after relying on them, that their employers could not fulfil their expectations. That would be a disaster to the social relations of this country. He hoped the Government would seriously consider whether the limitation of trades was a practical one, and whether for the safety and success of this Bill it would not be necessary to strengthen the base on which the Bill was built, and by putting both burden and benefit on all classes, make all responsible for the practical wisdom and economical success of the Measure. A few words as to details. The Bill was limited to four industries. Why was it so limited? He thought that was a mistake. If injuries were sustained in employments why should there not be equal compensation? ["Hear, hear!"] The Bill as it stood might produce what was the worst of any of the features in the relations of employers and employed—inequality. The Bill created anomalies, and he hoped the Government would very much enlarge its scope. If that was not done by this Government it would be done by the next House of Commons. He complained of the 6th Sub-section of Clause 3, which, he contended, was a derogation from the existing common law right of the workmen in the use of the word "wilful." These, however, were points which could be dealt with in Committee. He thought there were strong objections to the Measure as it stood, but on the other hand, it was a Bill which boldly dealt with a new principle in the development of economic and social views. As a new departure they would all gladly vote for its Second Reading as a tentative experiment.

Mr. THOMAS ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton) expressed his satisfaction that this new social departure had been accepted so quietly on the other side of the House. For himself, he thought the two great objections to the Bill were—first, that sufficient care was not taken in it for the further prevention of accidents; and, second, the limited scope of the Bill. Looking at the paternity of the Bill, he was a little disappointed that it was not in these respects of a different character. The Colonial Secretary objected greatly to the last Employers' Liability Bill because it did nothing to further prevent accidents, and it was limited in its scope. The right hon. Gentleman desired to see the scope of that Measure so enlarged that it would take in even domestic servants. Where were the right hon. Gentleman's servant girls to-day. [A laugh.] He regretted to say that they had been basely deceived and deserted by the Colonial Secretary. [Laughter.] It was certainly quite possible to take further means to prevent accidents. ["Hear, hear!"] Reference had been made to the German insurance system. He knew that very many hon. Members objected to anything that came from Germany. Sometimes German goods were superior to English goods, and he, personally, was not prepared to refuse to take a lesson from Germany if the goods she produced were of good quality. Taken as a whole, he regarded the German insurance system as a good system. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Fife described what he considered were the central and best features of that system, but in his opinion the right hon. Gentleman entirely overlooked what really was the system's best feature. The right hon. Gentleman told them that employers were grouped, and that they had to pay for all accidents. The House were led to suppose, either by the right hon. Gentleman or others, that in Germany there was a State direct insurance. Nothing was further from the fact. The main and best feature of the German system was that the funds were collected and managed by the employers. The employers, therefore, had every inducement to see that each member of their body conducted his business in the most careful manner possible. His firm had never insured, with the result that they had been very careful to take all precautions; but he felt that, with the added risks under this Bill, it would be necessary for them to insure, and if they did they would, he was sure, prefer to be grouped with fellow employers for purposes of insurance than to go to outside insurance companies. As the hon. Member for Gainsborough had pointed out, there might be a tendency on the part of employers to prefer to employ young and unmarried men to old and married men; but another serious objection to the Bill, in his opinion, was the great risk there was that employers would not be able to pay the compensation. He was glad that in all quarters of the House the opinion prevailed that the trade ought to bear the risk. If the trade was to bear the risk the employer was the only person to look to for the payment of the compensation. So far as collieries were concerned he sympathised with hon. Members who thought that part of the risk ought to come out of the pockets of the royalty owners. Royalties were rent in one form, and rent, economically speaking, was that which was left after labour and capital had received a fair return. If part of the workmen's compensation was going to be taken out of the proceeds of capital, part also ought to come out of the royalty as rent. Under the German system, instead of each employer being liable, instead of the workman having to take the risk of the employer's failure, there would be a growing fund contributed to by all the employers, out of which the workman would be certain to get his compensation. But if they could not have that, he hoped that the Government would, at any rate, consent to a plan under which lump sums would be paid instead of pensions for life. That would secure the injured workman against the risk of the subsequent failure of the employer. Coming to the question of contracting out, he admitted that the working man who came within the purview of this Bill would in most respects be free from the dangers of contracting out. At the same time, there would be a very large number of workmen who would still be subject to them. He believed that if they could have the German system, there would not be the same objection on the part of the supporters of this Bill to the inclusion within its scope of a very large number of the trades at present excluded. What was the main objection of the Government against the inclusion of a large number of trades? That which weighed with them was the plight of the poor employer who might not be able to stand the racket of the accidents. The Home Secretary had told them that he had selected certain trades because they were rich trades. So the Government were going to give this compensation to workmen who were employed by rich men, who would most likely give it in any circumstances, while the workmen under poor employers were to be deprived of it. He could not see any justification for this. It seemed to be assumed by some hon. Members that all the employers who would be affected by this Bill were wealthy people, but that was an error. There were a large number of farmers who could just as well afford to compensate their labourers as some of the employers who would come within the scope of the Bill. He did not mean by this that in his opinion the farming industry was prosperous, but he asserted that there were also a great many employers in the trades within the Bill who were not prosperous. In the town of Burnley, for example, the trade of cotton weaving was largely carried on by very small employers. There were weaving sheds with a thousand looms in them, but these looms were distributed very often among different employers, who ran some 200 looms apiece. The cotton was found for them by the cotton broker, and the position of these employers was very little indeed above that of working men. Their capital was very small. These considerations pointed to the desirability of establishing a general insurance system such as existed in Germany, under which all employers paid their little quota to the insurance fund. It had been pointed out that the risks in the agricultural industry were very small, and that was true, but, if that industry were brought within the Bill, the premiums payable by the farmer would also be correspondingly small, and the same was true of the householder. A man who met with an accident while working at one of the excluded trades deserved compensation just as much as a man working at a trade within the purview of the Bill. He held that in whatever trade an accident occurred the Bill ought to provide for compensation by that trade. The way in which the Bill in its present form would work would be most inequitable. Take the following instance. If a man was employed in a cotton factory, and a bale of cotton fell upon him and injured him, he would get compensation. In the next street, a man employed by a flour dealer might be injured in precisely the same way by a falling sack of flour, but he would get no compensation. He could only hope the day was not far distant when the Bill would be extended for the benefit of all workers, irrespective of whether they were employed by wealthy firms or by poor firms.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Whenever I have to make a speech in this House or in the country—an operation for which I have a profound distaste—[laughter]—I only have one ambition, and that is to express, in the fewest possible words and with the utmost clearness, the views which I hold upon the subject on which I have to speak. ["Hear, hear!"] If I am to test my oratory by what has just fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite, I am afraid I should have to confess that four years ago, when I spoke in this House on the Employers' Liability Bill, I must have egregiously failed. I should be altogether discouraged if it were not for the fact that, unless I am mistaken, the hon. Gentleman opposite tried and failed to be a Member of this House on that occasion—[laughter]—and consequently did not hear the speech which he has now criticised, and I am afraid he can hardly have read it since. He accuses me of a two-fold inconsistency. He says that on that occasion I laid great stress on the necessity for legislation for the prevention of accidents, whereas in this Bill nothing is done with that object; and he says, secondly, that, whereas on the previous occasion I advocated the claims of domestic servants, he now alleges, with a grace peculiarly his own, that I have basely deceived my servant girls. [Laughter.] The answer is very simple. My right hon. Friend the ex-Home Secretary introduced the Bill on which I then spoke as a Bill intended to prevent accidents, and I criticised it—I am not going into old discussions, which I think are now out of date—at that time severely on the ground that, in my opinion, it was not calculated to prevent accidents. I pointed out that, in my opinion, that was not the way to prevent accidents, and that, if you want to prevent accidents, if there was anything still to be done in the direction of preventing accidents, that result was to be sought either by increasing the stringency of your criminal legislation or by additional regulations for the protection of persons employed in industry. As regards domestic servants, it is perfectly true that I advocated their inclusion in that Bill, but that Bill, by admission, was a very much more limited Bill than the present one. I do not think there would have been the slightest objection—and, as a matter of fact, that was the general opinion of the House at that time—to do away with the doctrine of common employment, so far as domestic servants were concerned, but it would raise altogether a different question, which now I am not going to argue, if it were proposed to give domestic servants all the privileges which we propose to give the trades included in this Bill. Having dealt with what was personally addressed to myself, I will now trouble the House with a few remarks upon the general position in which we find ourselves. I rise now, because it seems to me that probably it would be the general wish of the House to come to an early decision.

[Cheers.] I think we have discussed the question very fully—I do not say in any sense too fully—and I believe there is a great desire that the important subject which is put down for Debate to-morrow should be taken, and that the consideration of this Bill should not therefore be unduly protracted. ["Hear, hear!"] There is another reason for reaching an early decision. It is this, that while I believe the discussion which we have had is useful, suggestive, and interesting, it must be admitted that it has been very unusual in its character upon the Second Reading of a great Bill, because I venture to say that, with the exception perhaps of a sentence or two in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, who moved an Amendment to the Bill, there has not been one single word from either side of the House directed to the principle of the Bill. [Cheers.] We have been prematurely discussing Committee details during the whole of the two days over which this Debate has lasted. I agree with the statement which was made by the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Cheshire, that the Government ought to be extremely satisfied with the general tone of the discussion. I do not agree with him when he said that our satisfaction would be to some extent lessened by the consideration of the criticism which we have received from our own friends behind us. I think the hon. Gentleman probably took his view from the headlines of a most influential party organ which has given a very great support to this Bill, but which, I observe to-day, in its account of our proceedings yesterday, described them as "Tory attacks upon the Bill: Liberal defences." [Laughter.] Of course, we are very glad of defence from whatever quarter it comes, but a more absolutely erroneous description—[cheers]—of the character of this Debate could not possibly be devised. The attacks upon this Bill, such as they are—the most serious attacks have come from the other side. They have come from the Member for Gainsborough; they have come from the Member for Durham, and suggestions have been made of a most insidious character, with a view to destroy the Bill, by the Member for Leicester, the Member for Glasgow, and from the Member for one of the Divisions of Cheshire to whom I referred just now. On the other hand, the Bill has been supported again and again by hon. Members on this side. In a speech to which I must pay, if I may be allowed to do so, a respectful compliment, my hon. Friend for one of the divisions of Sheffield gave, on the First Reading of the Bill, the most admirable, and at the same time the most succinct, defence of the Bill which I have heard in the whole course of these proceedings. ["Hear, hear!"] We have also had speeches from my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester, my hon. Friend the Member for one of the Wiltshire divisions, and by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, and from other hon. Members who have answered the objections which came from the Liberal side of the House. I do not think that the opposition to this Bill has come from employers on this side of the House. ["Hear, hear!"] On the contrary, I, at all events, am bound to recognise the spirit in which they have met the Government proposals, because we admit that we are now putting upon employers a new burden ["Hear, hear!"] I think some of my hon. Friends have exaggerated the amount of the liability which will now be imposed upon them, but we admit that we have put a new burden upon them without suggesting even that there is any moral liability in their case. [Cheers.] Notwithstanding that, employer after employer on this side of the House has got up to support the principle of the Bill and to express his readiness to submit to these sacrifices if he can be assured that the Bill will be effectual for its purpose, and will secure to those who may be injured in the course of their employment the compensation which humanity would willingly accord them. [Cheers.] There are two lines of criticism on this Bill which, as I say, have been chiefly developed in speeches from the other side of the House. It has been said that the provisions of the Bill would press very heavily on trade and industry and would seriously interfere with trade in certain particular industries named. ["Hear, hear!"] At the same time, it is argued that the Bill must be extended to other trades. Surely there is either inconsistency in that claim or great selfishness. [Cheers.] There is great selfishness—if hon. Members who hold this view really believe that their trade is to be ruined, as they have practically represented to us, by the impositions in this Bill—in suggesting that other trades should be ruined as well. On the contrary, they should be glad that some trades, at any rate, should be left in the United Kingdom even after this Bill has been passed into law. [Laughter.] These criticisms come from the same people. The people who want to extend the Bill are the people who say that their own trades will be ruined or seriously affected by it. [Opposition "No, no!" and cheers.]

MR. HUDSON KEARLEY (Devonport): Who says that trade will be ruined on this side of the House?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member for Gainsborough.

*MR. BAINBRIDGE: No, I beg pardon.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: If the hon. Member will allow me, I will finish my sentence. The hon. Member stated, unless my recollection deceives me, that the cost of this Bill would be over two pence a ton on coal, and the result would be that many coal mines would be closed. [Cheers.] I suppose that when a coal mine is closed the mine-owner may consider, at all events, that that trade has been ruined.

*MR. BAINBRIDGE: I said that a great many mines would be closed, not that the whole of the collieries would be ruined.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: What is the object of making this statement? It is true that the hon. Member and the hon. Baronet the Member for Durham are engaged in the same industry; and the hon. Baronet began by saying that he thoroughly approved the principle of the Bill. [Cheers.] If I believed that this Bill was going to ruin any considerable proportion of the coalowners of the country, I would have the courage to say that I did not approve it. [Cheers.] The hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Gainsborough and other hon. Members who have spoken from that side of the House "are willing to wound yet afraid to strike." [Opposition cries of "Oh, oh!" Ministerial laughter, and cheers.]

SIR J. JOICEY: It is not the principle; it is the methods we object to.

AN HON. MEMBER: Why do you not make it universal? [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: The question is whether it will ruin the mining industry of this country. If it will, then no one should vote for it; and I ask why do not hon. Gentlemen vote against the Second Reading?

SIR J. JOICEY: I do protest against the right hon. Gentleman continuing to misrepresent the speeches of hon. Members on this side of the House, when he has been told again and again that he is doing this. [Cheers.] I must ask him to accept the statement that I do not believe it will ruin the coal trade, and that I approve of the principle of the Bill as thoroughly as he does, but I object to its methods. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I am quoting the hon. Member for Gainsborough. The hon. Baronet the Member for Durham stated that he approved the principle of the Bill—that, I think, was the first sentence in his speech—and he went on to say that he thought he objected to every single provision in it. [Cheers.] I do not want to misrepresent hon. Gentlemen when I say that they are "willing to wound yet afraid to strike." [Ministerial cheers and Opposition "No, no!"] What is the conclusion of the hon. Baronet's speech? I have come to a suggestion made by the hon. Member for Leicester and other hon. Members; and they all agree in this—that they hope the Government will give ample time, that they thought it would probably be desirable, although the Government might proceed with this Bill, to give ample time for discussion—that is to say, to waste a certain amount of time this Session—and that the Government should withdraw it. [Cheers.] These hon. Members will probably go down to their constituents and tell them that they are in favour of the Bill while suggesting to the Government that they ought to withdraw it.

MR. HENRY BROADHURST (Leicester): I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to wilfully misrepresent anything I said. I never suggested that the Government should withdraw the Bill. [Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!" and ironical laughter.] What I said was that I was so much in favour of this Bill that rather than see it go through imperfectly—[ironical laughter and cheers]—I would suggest to the Government that they would suffer no disadvantage if they took a longer time to make their Bill a perfect one and an inclusive one, instead of an imperfect Measure. [Ironical cheers.]

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I must ask the House to consider whether I misrepresent the hon. Member? At all events, I will give the answer of the Government. We have brought in this Bill. We attach the utmost importance to the principle of it; we believe that the country has approved it—[cheers]—and we intend at all hazards to take the decision of the House of Commons upon it. [Cheers.] We are not going to accept the suggestion either of the hon. Member for Leicester or of the hon. Baronet the Member for Durham to withdraw this Bill—[ironical Opposition cheers]—when probably in the next Session something else may cause it to be indefinitely and permanently postponed. [Cheers.] After all, hon. Members opposite seem to think that I have done them an injustice. I am very sorry, but they will have the opportunity of showing hereafter where I am wrong. We will watch with the greatest and most friendly interest their proceedings in the subsequent stages of the Bill. [Cheers.] There are two ways of killing a Bill. You may kill it by cruelty; I am sure that they would not do that. [Laughter.] You may kill it by kindness, you may smother it with Amendments; and it seems to me as if from erroneous notions of what the House of Commons is capable, or from ulterior motives, which I do not impute, they are inclined to overlay this Bill and do their best, at any rate, to endanger it by the Amendments they have suggested.

AN HON. MEMBER: What about your own side?

MR. BROADHURST: Most unjust.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I want to warn the House and the friends of the Bill on both sides, because, although I have thought it necessary to indicate that this is the position of many hon. Members opposite, I must frankly admit that there are many hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for East Fife, who have dealt with this Bill in the most frank and the most cordial manner. I may refer also to the hon. Member for the Forest of Dean and other hon. Members who, I believe, are as friendly to the Bill as the Government themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] But let us on both sides of the House, then, watch the future proceedings on the Bill; and to all those who are friendly to the Bill I do desire to give a warning. It is admitted an all sides that we have had the courage of our opinions, that we have introduced a new principle into English legislation. ["Hear, hear!"] I think we may claim that it was a bold thing to do. [Cheers.] And in introducing this new legislation we have openly avowed our opinion that we could not possibly carry it too far. Sir, we believe in this experiment. [Cheers.] We believe that it will in practice be found to be even better perhaps than many of our friends now suppose; and possibly, when it can be done with safety and with general assent, it may hereafter be extended. ["Hear, hear!"] But if we had in the first instance brought in this new principle and applied it without exception to all the varied trades and industries in this country, we should have roused so much opposition—["hear, hear!"]—that it would have been absolutely impossible to carry the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Very well; we are serious in our desire that this new principle should have a fair trial, and we will not be led, therefore, by fancied analogies, by talk about logical consistency, to overlay our Bill with a number of separate proposals, all of which will have a tendency to increase the opposition to and thereby prevent the passage of this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] If it is suggested to us that there are cases which are exactly on all fours with the cases included within the Bill, of course those are matters to which we should be very glad to give our attention when we get into Committee, and if we find that without any injustice or without raising any great controversy we can add to the trades already included in the Bill, we shall be very happy to do so. But beyond that we do not propose to go. We propose to follow the course that has always been followed by every prudent Government in dealing with a similar subject. What is the history, for instance, of our factory legislation? ["Hear, hear!"] It is perfectly true, as my right hon. Friend said to-day, that the original proposal of the factory legislation and subsequent proposals were all, one by one, met with great hostility, and that they created great fears in the minds of the industrial classes, and that all that hostility and all those fears have been found to have been unnecessary. ["Hear, hear!"] But if, in the first instance, Lord Shaftesbury and his friends had proposed legislation dealing with every factory and every workshop in the country, does anybody suppose that that Bill could have been passed? Certainly not. It was proposed, in the first instance, to deal with the textile trade; it was proposed later on to add the engineering trade; other trades were added later on, and workshops also. The whole subject has been since reviewed in the light of experience, and a great extension of the principle has been by universal consent agreed to. Well, Sir, I sincerely hope that we may have as good fortune. All we claim to be is to be pioneers. We propose to establish the principle. If the principle fails in practice, of course no one will ever propose to extend it. If it has the success we believe it will have, then we shall consider the exclusions about which so much has been said. Now, Sir, just let us consider—and I do ask the House at this stage to consider, because it may save us time in Committee—what has been proposed in the course of this Debate. It has been proposed that we should add to this Bill—which is already, as I have said, a gigantic Bill—a new proposal of the utmost importance. It must be recognised, for it cannot be denied, that nothing has been more striking than the way in which the Bill has been received in the country. We know of hon. Members who declared beforehand their personal opinion against the Bill, who have, nevertheless, in this House, expressed their determination to support its principle. ["Hear, hear!"] I am not complaining of them in the least, but it is perfectly evident that this change of opinion has been brought about by communications with their constituents; and I do not hesitate to say that this principle is so popular that there will be the greatest indignation in the country if anything occurs to prevent effect being given to it in the present Session. [Cheers.] We are asked to add to this Bill the abolition of common employment. They wish us to bring in I do not know how many other trades, including the domestic servants, to whom one hon. Gentleman referred, the agricultural labourers, and the shipping trade, which has always been difficult and exceptional in its character. [Interruption from the Opposition Benches and Ministerial cries of "Order!"] What? I say that everybody who has the slightest information about it knows that the shipping trade is admitted to be exceptional. That is one proposal. Just consider it. Suppose the Government agree—I am not saying whether it is right or wrong—but suppose the Government agreed that it was right, and suppose thereupon they accept the Amendment and apply the abolition of the doctrine of common employment to all these other trades, when would the Session end under these circumstances if that great principle and its application to this number of important trades are to be discussed at length in the course of Committee and on the Report stage? ["Hear, hear!"] Then, in addition to that, we are to include in the general scope of the Bill a number of other trades, all of which have had their advocates in the course of the present Debate. We are to add provisions dealing with unhealthy trades. It is said that we might take a clause which was not introduced originally by my right hon. Friend in his Bill, but which was subsequently accepted my him in the course of the Committee Debates upstairs. Let me say one word about that. There is not a word of objection to be taken to the principle of that clause, which proposes to give damages against an employer for any injury to health suffered by a workman in consequence of the neglect of proper precautions by an employer in trade. But, Sir, the matter was not discussed in the Committee upstairs for this reason—that, owing to circumstances with which the House is familiar, the Opposition—the regular Opposition—was not represented on that occasion. And in the discussion on the Report stage the whole attention was concentrated on a particular question—viz., the question of contracting out, and accordingly the other provisions of the Bill received no sufficient investigation. I say, therefore, that that proposal, in a new House, under new circumstances, would deserve and would undoubtedly receive a great deal of discussion. I doubt myself whether the clause would be effective. I think it would lead to an immense amount of litigation. I think it would be almost absolutely impossible to establish a substantial claim for damages under it, because you would have to prove, in the first instance, that the illness of the workman was caused by the trade, and nothing else but the trade; that it was not caused by constitutional weakness on the part of the workman; and that it was directly due to the conditions of the trade; and then you would have to prove that proper precautions had not been taken, and you would have further to prove that the employer was responsible for their not being taken. Well, Sir, anyone who has any experience of litigation under the Employers' Liability Bill would know that it would be extremely difficult, at all events, for a poor workman to make good his complaint under a clause of that kind, and if we were to discuss it anew—I began by saying that I did not in the least object to the principle of the clause—but certainly, if we were to discuss it anew, it is one of those matters which would take a considerable amount of time. ["Hear, hear!"] Then another right hon. Gentleman proposes that we should consider the subject of State insurance. State insurance! It is a gigantic question. And supposing for a moment that we thought it right, raising as it would do, the opposition of the powerful vested interests already engaged in the work of private insurance—supposing we thought it right to do it, I undertake to say that if we made any proposal for State insurance, it would take three or four times as long as the whole of the present Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Then another Gentleman proposes that we should go into the deep and difficult subject of the proper incidence of the taxation which is to be levied in order to support the compensation which is to be given under the Bill. These are admirable proposals, but they are not practicable, and what I particularly call attention to is that they are brought forward by hon. Gentlemen who represent trades which profess to be in great danger of extinction under this Bill. Therefore I think I am justified in saying that not only would the result of passing these amendments be—I will not say fatal—but dangerous to the progress of the Bill, but I think I am justified in saying that that conclusion is not altogether absent from the minds of those who suggested them. It is said that our exclusion of certain trades is illogical. Of course it is; I grant that. But let it be borne in mind who are the people who are now calling for universal dealing with this great subject. Why, they are the people who proposed to deal with but 10 per cent. of the accidents. ["Hear, hear!"] What did they do when they had the opportunity of dealing with this subject? I daresay they may have felt it was very desirable to deal with the whole subject, but they very wisely, when they were the Government, proposed to deal with such portion of the subject as they thought they could deal with successfully, and in their case it was 10 per cent. of the accidents. Now that we propose to deal with 80 per cent. of the accidents they say, "You are leaving out 20 per cent. What an illogical proceeding!" [Laughter.] Of course you cannot draw an arbitrary line in legislation and at the same time profess to be absolutely logical. I perfectly agree with the right hon. Member for East Fife when he says it is no satisfaction to a man whose leg is broken by an accident in agricultural employment to be told that a man whose leg is broken in an engineering shop gets compensation. That is perfectly true; but you cannot observe this logical consistency in legislation. You do not observe it in any legislation. Look at your franchise legislation. Is that logical? ["Hear, hear!"] You say that when a man reaches the age of 21 he is to have a vote. Why is he to have a vote when he is 21 and not when he is 20 years and 364 days old? What is the difference in a man the day before he becomes 21 and the day afterwards? It is not logical, but it is admitted to be expedient. Look, again, at the question of taxation. Take, for instance, the income tax. You have limitations below which the income tax does not go. Is there anything logical in that? You say that a man with an income of only £160 a year shall pay no income tax, but that the man with £161 shall have his income taxed. There is no logic in that, but again I say it is expedient, and in the present instance to all those who really care for this Bill and for the establishment of the principle, I urge upon them that it is expedient in the interest of the Measure that it should be confined, at all events, within reasonable limits. [Cheers.] We are not concluding the question, we are not determining the principle. We admit that a case may be made for the trades which remain outside the Bill, but we say that this is not the year, this is not the time, in which their particular case can possibly or conveniently be dealt with. The hon. Member for one of the divisions of Wiltshire made a most eloquent plea on behalf of the agricultural labourers, but I think he was hardly just to our modern legislation, because he said the agricultural labourers had always been left out and nothing had been done for them. I will ask the House to consider what was done by the last Conservative Government for the agricultural labourer, and to observe that exactly the same thing happened—that is to say, the principle was arbitrarily restrained in its application. The last Conservative Government brought in legislation for enabling the agricultural labourers to become the owners of their small holdings and to become lessees of allotments, and gave them State aid for that purpose. But nothing again is done for the inhabitants of the towns. ["Hear, hear!"] Logically you cannot defend that. You cannot logically say that a workman in the town is not as much entitled to have assistance from the State in order to purchase his house as the labourer in the country is entitled to have assistance from the State to purchase his holding. I hope the case of the labourers in the towns will hereafter be taken. ["Hear, hear!"] But, at all events, no one has any right to complain that we are varying what has been the universal practice—namely, to deal with one thing at a time, and with one class, if that is the only practical way of dealing with it. I have said there may be cases in which we might probably include a little more than has been included in the Bill. I do not pretend there may not be brought to our notice cases which may have been accidentally omitted. We took as an arbitrary, but very convenient, definition the definition of the Factory Act as given in the Bill; and it will be remembered that, in regard to the building trade, the Factory Act does include in factory legislation buildings where no machinery is used, for some purposes, if they are above 30 ft. in height. It was the intention of the Government, and I am afraid that by some slip that intention is not carried out, to observe absolutely that definition, and we thought the House would be willing to accept the definition which had already appeared in our legislation in regard to the Factory Act. If, therefore, we have failed to include building operations where the buildings are over 30ft. in height, we certainly make no objection to including those buildings; and I have no doubt that that will bring in a very large additional number of labourers engaged in that trade. [Cheers.] I will just refer as briefly as I can to certain objections taken from two standpoints from which this Bill has been discussed.

In the first place, I will take those objections which have come rather from the representatives, I will say, of the employers' interests. Objection has been taken to the clause in which we propose that where an employer has been guilty of a wilful or wrongful act or default, the injured workman should have his remedy at his choice, either under the Bill or under the common law or any other statutory law. It is said those words are unusual. They are the best words that our advisers can suggest in order to convey what, perhaps, may be a new idea. We want to distinguish between what I will call moral negligence and technical negligence. I will give an illustration. An employer is technically liable and technically negligent when somebody in his employment in a position of responsibility, say a foreman, acts in such a way as to bring about an accident to a workman. But he is not morally negligent—["hear, hear!"]—in the vast majority of cases it might be contended that he knows nothing whatever about it, and has had no opportunity of preventing it. That I call technical negligence. For that you may make a man pecuniarily liable, but you do not attempt to impose upon him any moral reprobation. On the other hand, if there be a case in which an employer knowingly has neglected a precaution, after being warned, by which life might have been saved, and loss of life and limb has occurred in consequence, that man is morally responsible. He is criminally responsible; he may be—in some cases he is—guilty of manslaughter. We say in those cases we want to reserve to the workman every right which he has at present, or which any future law may give him, and therefore we have put in the Bill that in these cases of moral negligence the workman shall have his choice. That, at all events, is the intention of the Bill, and I believe we have carried it out. But, then, it is said, Why have you not done the same thing in regard to the workman, because the workman also may be guilty of an act, a wilful or wrongful act, for which he ought to be held responsible? I will make a frank statement of the ideas of the Government with reference to that question. I entirely agree as to the morality of the view. I have no doubt the workman ought to be placed upon exactly the same footing as the employer as a matter of right, but as a matter of expediency it appeared to us that, as one of our first objects was to avoid litigation, it was hardly worth while to provide against what, after all, is a very rare case, for the workman is not likely to be guilty of a wilful act or default by which he himself would suffer, and that to introduce such a provision might be to raise as a litigable matter the whole question of contributory negligence. That, however, is a matter for further discussion in Committee, but I hope the House will agree with the Government, and say that as to putting the workman in the game is not worth the candle. Another objection is that we have left a possibly unlimited claim for compensation for what is called permanent incapacity. For instance, to take an extreme case, a man at 25 is permanently injured. He may have, therefore, a claim upon the employer from 25, say, to 70, and that is an enormous liability. That is true. We have proceeded upon the doctrine of averages. What we find is, after inquiry from very large firms and very various employers, that the average of permanent incapacity is only something between three and six years, and we have thought that, as an average to be taken into account in an insurance policy, it would make very little difference. If you suppose, on the contrary, that employers will take this burden on themselves without spreading it over a general insurance, then, no doubt, there might be a case of great hardship, and if it is necessary to provide against such an exceptional case by an exceptional provision it is a point which the Government will be quite open to consider. But by far the most important objection taken on behalf of employers has been the objection that this new liability will be a heavy burden on industry. Now, it is admitted that the coal trade is the trade which will have to bear the heaviest burden, but all our calculations differ materially from those put before the House. I have been furnished by the Lancashire and Cheshire Mines Permanent Relief Fund with their particulars, and certainly I am unable from their statements to come to the conclusion that the cost would be anything like what was stated by the hon. Member for Durham and the hon. Member for Gainsborough. I have here the particulars of the whole of the accidents for which they have made themselves responsible, and the compensation which they have paid. I calculate that the cost under our Bill would be 20s. 9d. per £100 of wages. From statements made in the House I doubt very much whether hon. Members who have made other calculations have taken into account the fact that for the first two weeks there is no payment under our Bill; and although those accidents are minor accidents with which we do not think it necessary that the State should deal, yet, as they are very numerous, the compensation for them amounts to a considerable sum.

SIR J. JOICEY: In his calculation has the right hon. Gentleman taken the wages of the underground men separately? Because by far the larger proportion of accidents take place among them, and they receive the largest part of the wages.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I have taken the figures as given to me—the total number of men and the total amount of wages. These are the returns of an association of coalowners, and we must take the calculation over the whole of the employment and the whole of the wages. ["Hear, hear!"] If you took a dangerous employment like the railway shunters' alone, the charge would be enormous; but in reckoning the charge on railway companies I have taken the whole of the employment, and that is the only fair way. [Cheers.] I have calculated that the cost will be 1 per cent., roughly. But suppose it is 2 per cent. It is said that this may be fatal to certain mine owners, and to mines which are unfavourably situated. Surely that is a mistake, and hon. Gentlemen exaggerate the effect of a charge of 2 per cent. on wages. They are mistaken in supposing that this charge could not be got out of the cost of the article. This addition of 2 per cent. is nothing compared with the ordinary fluctuations of the trade. In the last three years the average wages in this very industry, for this very association, have gone from 23s. to 26s.—a rise of 15 per cent. [Cheers.] On that one item, wages, there has been a fluctuation in three years of 15 per cent., and yet they say that a fluctuation of 2 per cent. would make trade impossible. I am convinced that when this charge is put, not merely on one owner, but on all owners, and is, in effect, mainly a charge upon a particular industry, that the conditions of the trade will very soon adjust themselves to the new liabilities, and that these undertakings will not find themselves in the desperate condition which they now fear. One or two objections were taken from the workmen's point of view. Some hon. Members, but not, I believe, the representatives of the working classes, have said that they fear the effect of this arrangement upon the friendly societies. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that this proposal will give an immense impetus to friendly societies. [Cheers.] It will throw upon them the burden of their due work. It will leave open to them the dealing with those trumpery accidents which ought properly to be provided for by the thrift of the workmen themselves. ["Hear, hear!"] I call them trumpery accidents because they do not detain the workman long from his work. It will leave open all that is connected with the health and superannuation of the workman, and I am convinced that, when the burden is taken off the workman of providing for accidents which occur in the course of his employment, he will have the money, and he will spend it in making provision in other directions through the friendly societies. [Cheers.] We have been told that while we have provided for incapacity we have not defined incapacity. There seems to be doubt in some minds as to what is meant by total and partial incapacity, by permanent and temporary incapacity. Well, we will not attempt to tariff incapacity—so much for an eye, so much for a leg, so much for an arm, and so much for a hand. There is something very disagreeable in any such attempt—[" hear, hear! "]—and something calculated to raise what may be called sentimental objections, but what are really serious objections. The attempt is also open to such practical objections as that you never can tariff all the accidents which may possibly occur. But what we propose is that the moment a man is injured—whether the accident ultimately develops into total or partial, permanent or temporary, incapacity—and is prevented from pursuing his ordinary employment he has a right to compensation. [An HON. MEMBER: " After two weeks! "] Certainly, after two weeks. Then the amount of compensation is not fixed by the Bill, but a maximum of half the wages is fixed. If the incapacity is total I think the employer will offer him full compensation, or the arbitrator will give it to him. But this case is put—a man may be partially incapacitated; he may still be able to perform other work at a little less remuneration, such a case, for instance, as that of a man who has been earning 30s. a week, and who after an accident gets only 25s. Such a man is entitled to compensation, but undoubtedly the amount of the compensation should be limited to the extent of the incapacity. [" Hear, hear! "] That is to say, the amount of pecuniary compensation he would get would be proportionate to the amount of pecuniary loss he would sustain by the accident. ["Hear, hear! "] Another objection taken, and it is rather an important one, is that although we have provided for compensation, we have not provided against the possibility of the bankruptcy of the person who is to pay the compensation. But my right hon. Friend opposite did not propose to provide against bankruptcy. He was quite right. It is altogether outside the scope of the Bill. Of course, it would be most advisable, if the thing were possible, that we should pass an Act providing that every debtor should pay his debts. [" Hear, hear! " and laughter.] But do not let it be supposed that the grievance is greater in the case of an injured workman than it is in the case of any one else. I have known the most pathetic cases of people who tried to save up money for their old age, and by the failure of a friendly society or a bank lost everything. [" Hear, hear! "] That is a great grievance; but it has never been proposed by legislation to make these people secure against loss. It would be perfectly illogical to provide against bankruptcy in the case of injured workmen and not to provide against bankruptcy in other cases where bankruptcy creates as much suffering; and we, therefore, ought not to be asked to introduce what is really a foreign subject into our Bill. [" Hear, hear! "] I recognise and am grateful for the very frank, cordial and generous support given to the Bill by my right hon. Friend opposite. He said very truly that there was nothing consistent between the principle of this Bill and the principle of the Bill which he brought in. But there is a distinction between them. There are two classes of reformers in the world. There are reformers that want to punish somebody—[laughter]—and there are reformers who want to benefit somebody. [" Hear, hear! " and laughter.] They both of them fulfil a mission, and I do not deny that each of them is very useful occasionally in fulfilling his mission. But one party are anxious for punitive Measures; the other party are anxious for Measures of relief. That is the distinction. All Employers' Liability Bills hitherto were Bills for punishing the alleged negligence of the employers.

["Hear, hear!"] This is not a Bill which supports any idea of that kind. ["Hear, hear!"] This is a Bill for bringing relief to the injured men—[cheers]—and, although undoubtedly it will lay in the first instance a new liability on the employer, we believe he will be able to distribute that liability over the trade in which he is engaged. I believe that the liability under this Bill is no more, and I know in some cases it is less, than what the generous employer undertakes at present. ["Hear, hear!"] I could name hon. Members on both sides of the House who are at the present time doing more voluntarily than this Bill would impose upon them. But they do it out of their own pockets, because they do it in competition with people who do nothing. But when we have brought all employers into line the element of competition will not arise, and then it will be possible to obtain the increased cost from the consumers who use the goods. It is said that the foreign competition would still remain; but at the present time the liability on foreign employers is as great as we are imposing on our own manufacturers under this Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Under these circumstances we present this Bill to the House, and we rejoice that we have received so much support from employers in the House. We know that we have the support of the workmen outside, and we, therefore, have every reason to hope that we may be able to place the Bill on the Statute Book this Session. ["Hear, hear!"] The hon. Baronet the Member for Durham began his speech to-night by saying that no more important Bill had been introduced during the last 50 years. He mentioned also the Free Schools Bill, and I think that the Party which has introduced these two great Measures may take some credit for being earnest in their desire to benefit the working classes of this country. [Cheers.] The hon. Baronet went on to say that he was only astonished that a Measure of this kind should come from the Tory Party. I might take exception to that and say we on this Bench call ourselves Unionists. [Ministerial cheers and Opposition laughter.] But I care nothing for that, I do not complain that the hon. Baronet will not give me the title which I claim for myself, because I refuse to him the title which he claims for himself. I refuse altogether to say that an employer of labour who is hostile to this Bill is any true representative of Liberal sentiment. [Cheers.] But I say that this surprise is altogether misplaced, and if he had any knowledge whatever of the political history during the last century he would not be surprised at all that the Tory Party should have brought in a Bill of this kind. [Ministerial cheers and Opposition cries of "Oh!"] I remember in the year 1874 I stood for Sheffield —[AN HON. MEMBER: "As a Home Ruler!"]—and certainly at that time the hon. Baronet would not have denied to me the title of an advanced Liberal, and I remember that during that Election I made it a part of my programme—[AN HON. MEMBER: "Unauthorised!"]—to do something in the direction of the social legislation which has occupied so much of our legislative time since that period, and I pointed out then to my Liberal friends that they were the most backward Party in this connection. [Cheers.] I pointed out again and again that it was not so with the Tory Party—I was ashamed of it then—[laughter]—I was ashamed that the Party to which I then belonged had been so backward in the matter, and I pointed out that all this social legislation had been initiated and to a large extent carried out by the Tory Party—["hear, hear!"]—that the Liberal Party had done a great deal in the way of political reforms for the working classes, but that so far as social legislation for their welfare was concerned almost the whole credit was due then, as it is now, to the Tory Party. [Cheers.] I said that in 1874, and I say it in 1897. Who introduced the whole of this factory legislation for which hon. Gentlemen opposite take all the credit?

Mr. J. SAMUEL (Stockton): Who objected to it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN: I have noticed that the hon. Member opposite has the most peculiar faculty of irrelevant interruption—["hear, hear!"]—that I have ever known in this House. He asks me who objected to it? Well, Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden. I believe they were Liberals. ["Hear, hear!"] It is extraordinary that the new Liberals should be so extremely ignorant of the history of their Party, and of the political history of their country. When the history of this Bill comes to be written will some hon. Member for Stockton get up then and say "Who opposed it?" and is the answer to be, "the hon. Baronet the Member for Durham, the hon. Member for Gainsborough, and other hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House?" I hope not. After all, my great anxiety is now, as it was in 1874, to see this legislation carried, and I hope hon. Gentlemen opposite have learnt their lesson and that now we may have their support where probably 20 years ago we should have had their opposition. I say this Bill is one of which any Party may well be proud. We introduce it to the House and to the country as an act of justice to, and as an act of sympathy with, the working classes of this country, and, believing that it will be recognised as such in the country, we confidently bring it forward. [Cheers.]

*Mr. REGINALD McKENNA (Monmouth, N.), who was interrupted by cries of "Divide!" said that the discussion had been carried on with scarcely any trace of Party recrimination until the right hon. Gentleman had risen. Hon. Members on that side of the House had given far more genuine support to the Bill than hon. Members opposite. The right hon. Gentleman had condemned amendments of the Bill, though it must be admitted some amendment was desirable. But even if the Government followed the precedent established by themselves of accepting no amendment, he, for his part, would still vote for the Third Reading of the Bill. He believed it to be admirable in principle, but, as the Home Secretary had admitted, it was susceptible of amendment in several important respects.

*Colonel BLUNDELL (Lancashire, Ince) said he sympathised with the aim of the Government, but he believed the principle of the Bill to be unsound. They had adopted the German system of compensating workmen without the safeguards which made that system feasible. The principle adopted in this country had been that employer and employed should contribute to the compensation to be paid. That had been done voluntarily, and he wanted to know why the employed was no longer to contribute. All wages had been settled with reference to that arrangement. He contended that the system of payment—by both employers and employed, as in Germany—for 13 weeks should be extended to this country; and he hoped the Government would make the employed contribute towards the sum to be paid for compensation in all cases. If that were done there would be more mutuality, and the great change in the relationship of employers and employed which would be caused by throwing the whole weight on one side would be avoided.

Mr. HAROLD RECKITT (Lincolnshire, Brigg) said he wished to call attention to the case of the men who were employed in loading and unloading ships in our docks and harbours. The extent to which these men would come within the Bill would be a question of argument in Committee; but assuming that they were to come under the operation of the Bill, the question arose what were the conditions under which they were employed. Cases occurred in the river Thames, within a few miles of the place where they were now sitting, and they ought to be dealt with. He would like to mention a case which occurred lately of a barge being run down by a foreign ship in the Thames. That ship was held up in the port of London for the damage done to the barge, and was detained until security was given for the amount of the damage; but the man who was navigating the barge was drowned, and left a wife and nine children. Yet there was no process of law known in this country by means of which the widow and children of this man could get compensation out of the owner of the foreign ship for his death. No doubt an action could be brought in an English Court and a judgmen obtained, but the judgment could not be satisfied. Such cases ought to be dealt with in Committee, and he asked the sympathy of the House in support of an Amendment in that direction. He thought that when a man who fulfilled his duty met with injury he was entitled to compensation. He pressed the matter on the Government, for it was one above all Party considerations. He appealed to all who were not acquainted with this particular trade to take up a sympathetic attitude. There were many cases of great hardship where a man's family got no compensation. He concurred in the principle of the Bill, but hoped vigorous efforts would be made to amend it in the direction he had indicated. He would like to say, in conclusion, that he regretted exceedingly the tone of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who spoke on behalf of the Bill on the part of the Government. He regretted that no one had risen to criticise that speech.

Mr. DRAGE asked leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; Bill Read a Second time amid cheers.

On the Motion that the Committee stage be taken on Monday,

Mr. ASQUITH asked what length of time the Government proposed should elapse before the Committee stage was really entered upon? He hoped that a reasonable interval would be allowed.

Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider that a reasonable interval would elapse if the Committee stage were taken on Monday, but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would ask the Leader of the House a question upon the subject on Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND TENURE (WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

*Mr. VAUGHAN DAVIES (Cardiganshire) proposed, "That the Bill be now read a Second time." He said that he wished the House to understand that in doing so he was not going to break through any of the ancient traditions which that Assembly so safely guarded. The House had already approved of the principle of separate legislation for Wales in connection with the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill, the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill, and the Bill for the Disestablishment of the Welsh Church had been read a Second time. The same principle had also been acted upon in the case of the Welsh Land Commission, which had been appointed to inquire into the conditions of land tenure in that country. In bringing forward this Measure he desired that it should be thoroughly understood that he was actuated by no political object, and had not adopted that course for Party purposes. It had been asserted that the Measure had been promoted with the object of getting up an agitation in Wales, but that was not the fact. This important question had been before the Welsh people for the last 25 years. In 1883 the North Wales Property Defence Association had passed a Resolution declaring that the time had arrived when a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into the incidence of land tenure in Wales, but that Resolution was not acted upon until 1893, when such a Commission was appointed by Mr. Gladstone's Government. There could be no doubt that land hunger had taken a strong hold upon the people of Wales, as was clearly shown by the evidence that had been given before the Welsh Land Commission. Why was it that the people of Wales had got into their minds such a strong longing for the land? In endeavouring to answer that question they must remember that there were at the present time 500,000 people in Wales who could not speak the English language; and being, therefore, debarred from obtaining employment in England, were compelled to engage in agriculture in their own country. Another consideration was that in Wales there were only 3,000,000 of acres of land available for cultivation, which gave an average of less than 50 acres for each of the 65,000 Welsh agriculturists. Welshmen were undoubtedly influenced by a strong love of country, but it was only through their determination to work and to live harder than the English labourers that the Welsh agriculturists were able to pay their way. He was most anxious to do full justice to the Welsh landlords, but even they would admit that the agricultural land in Wales was too highly rented, and that this was the case was proved by the fact that at rent audit day they almost invariably returned to the tenants from 5 to 15 per cent. of the rent. This reduction of rent was carried out upon no regular system, and, therefore, the farmers never knew really how much rent they would be called upon to pay; and they had to live upon the good will of their landlords. Another subject that largely affected the Welsh tenant farmers was the way in which notices to quit were served upon them. In 1868 these notices fell upon the tenants like a shower of snow simply for political reasons. The tenants were, moreover, subject to receive these notices merely upon the ground that their landlord's gamekeeper had alleged that they had shot a rabbit or a cock pheasant. How could farmers be expected to cultivate their farms properly in such circumstances as that. ["Hear, hear!"] Within the last year or so they had had another illustration of the manner in which Welsh landlords used this power of eviction. It was well known that farmers who had given evidence before the Welsh Land Commission had been turned out of their farms in consequence of their having done so, and yet no landlord had been prosecuted for taking such a step, although the Act under which the Royal Commission was appointed imposed a fine of £100 or three months' imprisonment upon any landlord who evicted his tenant for such a reason. The only way to protect the Welsh tenant was to establish a Welsh Land Court which would be able to give the tenants security of tenure and compensation for improvements. It was no use to trust to voluntary action in reference to the land question in Wales, and any legislation on the subject must be of a compulsory character. He maintained that all Voluntary Laws were rotten. It was useless to talk to Welshmen of voluntary laws or boards of conciliation after the rebuff the President of the Board of Trade received in the case of the North Wales quarrymen. If conciliation failed in such a matter as that it would fail also in reference to landlords and tenant farmers. Welshmen believed that nothing short of a Land Court with compulsory powers would ever do any good. It was proposed to construct such a Court on the lines of the County Court, for the sake of economy. There they would have all the machinery ready to hand, except that instead of the judge being a lawyer, he would be an agricultural judge appointed and paid by the Board of Agriculture, from a list of names supplied by each County Council. His suspension or removal was to be at the discretion of the Department, which he hoped was sufficient proof of the desire of the promoters of the Bill to keep him free from all outside pressure. The decisions of the agricultural judge were to be final, except in points of law, which would be referred to the County Court Judge, whose decision would be final. Each Court was to keep a tenant holdings' book, in which every judgment and order of the Court was to be recorded, as well as the state of the farm when taken over, and the improvements done by the landlord, and every tenant after the passing of the Bill would become a judicial tenant, neither party having power to contract out of the Bill. The Board of Agriculture would determine the district of the Court in which each agricultural judge should act. Then came the very important question of rent. Under the present system farmers bid recklessly against one another, knowing full well they could not pay the rent they offered, and simply hoping they would get a reduction from the landlord. It was proposed, therefore, that the agricultural judge should go over the farm and place a rent upon it which would have to be paid within a month of its becoming due, and which would remain in force for a term of five years, and would continue in force after the expiration of the term unless a fresh application were made by either party. Then came a question of immense importance, the question of agreements. Under the Bill it was proposed to give the farmer a free hand to farm as he liked and sell what he liked, so long as he returned sufficient manure on the land. In his evidence before the Commission Major Birch said:—

> "I would not be interfered with as regards any course of cropping. I am speaking as a practical farmer now. I would not sign an agreement that interfered with me, if I did not know it was going to be a dead letter."

The agent of the Bodorgan estates, referring to the oppressive clauses in his own agreements, said they were never used, and might as well go out. They were only incumbrances. Mr. Wynn, late agent of the Wynnstay Estates, said:—

> "There is not an agreement on any estate in the country, I think, which cannot be remodelled, I think, to a very great advantage; and if I were to take up an agency again, I believe I could write a perfectly satisfactory agreement on a sheet of notepaper."

So under the Bill all those silly clauses would be done away with. ["Hear, hear!"] It was, however, desired to leave a certain amount of freedom of contract under the Bill, and power would be reserved to the landlord and tenant to come to a mutual, reasonable agreement. Such an agreement would, however, have to be recorded in the tenants' holding book, and would become a judicial tenancy as if ordered by the Court. He now came to the question of improvements. Under the present law it was next to impossible for the tenant to get them allowed. It was too expensive a process for him. Under this Bill the matter would be settled by the Agricultural Court on easy and inexpensive terms. In the same way the landlord's right to dilapidations would be equally guarded, and he would also have the right to acquire land for building cottages, for gardens, planting and working materials, with, of course, proper reductions of rent. ["Hear, hear!"] The landowner would also have the right to take into his own hands or to put into the hands of one of his family, a farm for permanent occupation, paying the outgoing tenant for all his improvements, and for disturbance; and to prevent fraud, the landowner or his relative would have to live on the farm for three years or pay double compensation to the tenant turned out. ["Hear, hear!"] His aim and object in the introduction of the Bill had been to try and deal honestly and fairly between landlord and tenant, and to place the farmers of Wales on a more honourable and secure footing than they now held. He begged to move the Second Reading of the Bill. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. BRYNMOR JONES (Swansea Boroughs) supported the Motion. He desired to call the attention of the House to the special circumstances in regard to land tenure in Wales, as a very different condition of things existed in the Principality from that which existed in most of the English counties. The Bill did not propose to create any tenant right that did not already exist. It did not give to the tenant of the holdings to which the Bill applied the right of free sale, and they asserted, therefore, that no part of the capital value of the land, or of any capital expended by the landlord in improving the land, was under the operation of this Bill transferred from the landlord's pocket to the tenant's pocket. This Welsh land question was no new thing. There had never been a more fallacious notion propagated by the Press of this country, or advocated by Party politicians, than the notion that the Welsh land question was a mere Party political agitation in servile imitation of the Irish action. ["Hear, hear!"] The Commission had reported unanimously combined with the English system of land tenure, tenure from year to year, combined with the English system of estate management had been in vogue there had been the gravest dissatisfaction among the Welsh people. More than 50 years ago, at the time of the civil disturbances known as the Rebecca riots, the very same demand for fair rents on their holdings was advanced by the peasants and farmers as was advanced now. The prevalent tenure of agricultural land in Wales had worked with gross injustice to the tenant farmers, and had created a substantial grievance which could only be remedied by legislation on some such lines as they now proposed. The operation of this system of land tenure had resulted in an unjustifiable increase of rent, and an unfair division of the profits of the agricultural industry which was carried on jointly by landlord and tenant. It had had the effect of confiscating the improvements made by the labour and capital of the tenants and their ancestors on some holdings; it had hampered the industry by the imposition of unreasonable conditions; and had materially disturbed the happiness and peace of the Welsh peasantry. The actual nature of the system was too well known in that House to need more than a passing reference. Nearly the whole of Wales was now under cultivation, and the system of estate management was more or less that adopted in the English counties. The landlord was supposed to—and in many cases did—make the permanent improvements and the more important repairs, while the tenant stocked the farm and supplied the necessary capital and labour for working it. It was not until the end of the last century that this system of estate management and of tenure from year to year began to become prevalent in the Principality. Nearly 90 per cent. of the occupiers of the soil were tenants from year to year. He attacked the whole system of land tenure as it existed in Wales. The first and most noticeable thing was the comparative smallness of the holdings. The holdings from 20 to 50 acres were 20'48 in Wales as compared with 14'74 per cent. in England. The holdings from 50 to 100 acres were 16'69 per cent. in Wales as compared with 10'82 per cent. in England. In Wales, moreover, the holdings went down as low as from three to five acres. Then the next point was the smallness of the Welsh farmers' labour bill, the proportion of in-door to out-door labour being much greater in Wales than in England. The typical Welsh farmer worked with his labourers, and depended also very largely on the labour of his wife, and even of his young children, who ought to be at school. The whole organisation of the farm had a family character. In one case the Commission found that a grandfather, a son and his wife, three grandsons, and several great-grandchildren were living on one small farm. Another noticeable point was the almost insatiable land hunger which existed in Wales. This feeling was not only prompted by the desire to carry on farming avocations, but by the passionate attachment of the Welsh people to the soil on which their forefathers had lived for generations. That was an element which any sound statesmanship must take into account. The Commission unanimously reported that derelict farms were unknown in Wales. There was practically no land that was cultivable that could not be let, but, on the other hand, holdings that were really not worth cultivating existed in great numbers. Colonel Hughes, the agent for the Wynnstay estate, in giving evidence before the Commission, referred sympathetically to the struggles of the farmers on such holdings. He would have left this matter there but for the fact that the hon. Member for Shropshire had in a recent Debate denied the existence of this land hunger. The fact was that even since the depression set in there was no lack of demand for Welsh farms. He might give many instances but would take a few. The agent of Lord Kenyon's estate in Shropshire said that he had on his books at the time he was giving evidence between 30 and 40 names of eligible men willing to take any farm on the estate. Sir Joseph Bailey told them that in 1893, the period of acute agricultural depression, he had 20 applications for a vacant farm in Brecknockshire, and it was also shown that for a farm near Cowbridge, in Glamorganshire, which recently fell vacant, there were 24 applications. For a farm in Cardiganshire there were 59 or 60 applications. Another remarkable economic fact in regard to the land of Wales was the long duration of tenancies, or, in other words, the hereditary character of the connection of particular families with the same holding. In listening to the many witnesses before the Commission, nothing struck him more than the testimony in that regard. The Wynnstay estate consisted of several parcels of land which were divided into five or six separate estates. On one estate there were two farms which had been in the same holding for 400 years; five farms for between 300 and 400 years; three from 150 to 250 years. That gave an average in the ten cases of 286 years. On another estate nine farms had been in the same holding for between 100 and 200 years; five for between 200 and 300 years; and one for 400 years. It was credibly believed that one farm had been in the occupation of one family for about 1,000 years. [Cheers.] That statement was cheered, but the explanation was that down to the end of the last century the relations between landlord and tenant were those of customary tenure, and not of competitive tenure, and that the moment the latter system came into operation, there were continual changes in the tenancies. There was, for instance, one old estate which presented precisely the same phenomena as the Wynnstay estate. It changed hands about 20 years ago. The purchaser, who paid about £36,000 for the estate, was a humane man; he intended to do his best by the tenantry, and he spent his money freely in making improvements. The estate consisted of 25 farms. Twenty years ago 25 Welsh families lived on the estate, but now there were only four of the original tenants. The next thing he would like to mention as a peculiarity of Wales was that, owing to historic circumstances into which he could not go very minutely now, a very much larger share—an exceptionally large share—of the improvements made upon the holdings had been made by the expenditure of the capital of the tenant rather than of the landlord. Since the beginning of this century, the English system of management had gradually come into operation, but it was an odd thing that quite recently the tenants from year to year in Anglesey were found making permanent improvements. In its operation the system prevailing in Wales had resulted in large and continuous raising of rent by means of revaluations, in which the tenants' share of the improvements had been ignored, or by actual evictions or voluntary withdrawals without adequate compensation. Some years ago, when his hon. Friend the Member for Merionethshire introduced his Bill relating to Welsh land, considerable controversy arose as to the question of increase of rent. All the difficulties had now been cleared away, as the figures had been ascertained. The first time that the income tax was levied upon the rental of real property was 1814-15. Comparing the returns under Schedule A for that year and for the different decades from 1842-43 down to the present time, he found that in the case of the county of Anglesey the gross rents of agricultural land had increased by 142·8 per cent. The figures did not relate to houses or tenements, or to any holding of less than two acres. In Carnarvonshire the increase amounted to 101·3; in Merionethshire to 73·9; in Pembrokeshire to 93·1 per cent., and in Radnorshire to 63·4 per cent. In Wales, excluding Monmouthshire, generally, the increase was 66·9 per cent., and in Wales and Monmouthshire 63·2 per cent. [An hon. Member: "Is that for the same land, or for an additional quantity of land?"] If additional land had been brought into cultivation that might account for the rent going up; some allowance would have to be made. Their proposition was that there had been a very large and a very unfair increase of rent; that it involved the exploiting of the tenant farmer by the landlord's monopoly, and that the rent paid did not represent what would be the true rent, if an economic account were taken on a proper basis, between the landlord and the tenant. The next point was that these rents had gone on continually increasing from 1814-15 up to 1882-83. As might have been expected, from the fact that the great agricultural depression made itself felt a little later than in England, about 1880-81 there came a fall in the returns under Schedule A for 1882-83. The fall for the decade 1882-83 to 1892-93 in the whole of Wales, as distinct from Monmouthshire, was only 6·2, and in Wales and Monmouthshire 6·3, and, in comparison, he should like to say that, after the most minute investigation, the Commission came to the conclusion that, if they averaged the fall in prices over all the ordinary produce of Welsh farms, the fall from 1880 to 1893-94 was about 33 per cent. He asked the House to bear in mind how comparatively small had been the percentage of fall of gross rental as compared with the fall in prices. He also wanted to make one comparison between the reduction of rent, as it appeared on the basis of these tables, in England and in Wales. The Commission took nine counties which on the whole seemed most nearly to resemble the economic circumstances of the 13 counties of Wales. They found that, while in England rent had decreased, as judged by these returns, by 23·7 per cent. since 1879-80, when the depression made itself generally felt, in Wales and Monmouthshire the decrease had only been 7·1 per cent., showing that the abatements of the English landlords had been much more generous than the abatements of the Welsh landlords. Apart from the question of rent, which was practically at the root of the whole matter, there had been a good deal of virtual confiscation of improvements by revaluation. That was a practical point on which all the Commissioners were agreed. They found that the way in which, upon sale or succession, the holdings were revalued under the existing law was extremely unjust to the tenant. It might be asked why did not the tenants, when they received notice to quit at the time of a sale, come under the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883; but here again their extreme land hunger and the temper of the people came into play. If they pursued that course, it would inevitably be taken by the agent of the estate, or by the agent of the new purchaser, as an indication that they wanted to leave the estate, or that they were a grumbling set of people whom it would be well to get rid of. There was one thing he ought to say of a general kind. The insecurity of tenure from year to year poisoned the whole life of the tenant farming class, and had a distinctly disastrous effect upon the general character of the people. They were so impressed with this, that they had actually found the tenants, apparently free men, were afraid to come before the Commission to give evidence. He was not going to say that there was any absolute justification for their fears. He believed that the Welsh tenants on the larger estates might have come forward without any fear of injury to their interests or of eviction, but the Commission found that the 13 counties they went into were permeated with this fear and suspicion of the landlord and the agent, and that operated in the most injurious way upon the peace and happiness of the tenant farming classes of Wales. He did not suppose it could be denied that there were grievances, and the question arose how were they to be remedied. Two remedies had been suggested. The first was the creation by a system of land purchase, on a considerable scale, of a peasant proprietary. The other was the regulation of the agricultural industry. He had come to the conclusion, after visiting these counties, that a man was very much better off as a tenant upon an estate, if he was only paying a fair rent and had reasonable security of tenure, than he was as an occupying freeholder. It seemed to him that most of the occupying freeholders of Wales had simply exchanged the sway of the landlord for the sway of the mortgagee, and he, for one, did not think the true solution for the difficulty was to be found in the creation of a peasant proprietary. He was firmly of opinion that the true and statesmanlike way of dealing with the question was to regulate the industry. He said "regulate the industry" advisedly, because there was no such great and essential difference between the operations of the agricultural industry and other industries. The same principles which had led Parliament to pass Acts for the protection of workers, like the Factory Acts, the Workshops Act, and the Coal Mines Regulation Act, really applied to landlord and tenant under this system. Landlord and tenant were partners, and the main gravamen that he made against this system, quite apart from the special circumstances of Wales, was that it inevitably tended to an unfair division of the profits between landlord and tenant. An eminent economist, the late Professor Walker, himself inclined to favour the principle of freedom of contract, had said:—

> "Wherever there is a peasantry unfitted for competition upon commercial principles with a powerful and wealthy class under a painful pressure of population, there the regulation of the holding of land becomes a proper matter for State regulation."

He claimed that the circumstances of Wales which he had mentioned disclosed a state of things that came within that proposition. He claimed to have shown, upon indisputable facts, without raising any matters of unpleasant controversy in regard to any estate in Wales, that the condition of things there justified their demand for separate legislation. He should like the House to remember that the whole of the Land Commissioners, though their solutions were different, found that a case for separate legislation had been made out. But though they were asking for separate legislation for Wales, both upon economic and historic grounds, they were not demanding it in any separatist spirit. Their policy was a differential, and not a separatist policy. He was convinced it would be found that, whether this Bill passed or not, no part of the United Kingdom was more desirous of maintaining the strength of the great empire to which they belonged than the 13 counties with which he had been dealing. But they said they were entitled to have their particular characteristics observed. The farmhouses of Wales had been the nurseries of a gifted and sturdy race. The meaning of their Bill, imperfect though it might be, was that they were seriously asking the House to help them to keep the homes of the Welsh people for the Welsh people themselves. The strength of the Empire did not depend upon the uniformity of law. It depended upon the perpetuation of the race, upon a continuous line of capable and vigorous citizens, and what he claimed for the Bill was that that would be its effect, and that, if it were passed, the strength of the Empire would be largely maintained by the present tenant farmers of Wales and their descendants.

MR. POWLETT MILBANK (Radnor) proposed to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months." He claimed for himself and his Friends on the Government side of the House the same earnest desire to see the tenant farmers of Wales happy and prosperous as he gave hon. Members opposite credit for. Only they looked at the question from a different point of view. They did not wish separate legislation for Wales, and he did not see that any case had been shown, or any just demand made out, for a Bill to establish a Land Court for the Principality. The legislation on fair rent and Land Courts for Ireland did not satisfy either side of the House, and the experiment would be equally unsatisfactory in the case of Wales. No warrant had been shown for the Bill from agricultural depression, which had been less severe in Wales than anywhere. From a Return showing the variation in the income tax valuation for the period 1879 to 1894 he found that reductions of 10 per cent. had been made in only eight counties of Wales, and reductions of over 10 and under 20 per cent. in two counties only. It was evident, therefore, that agricultural depression had not been felt so strongly in Wales as in England. Let him criticise the Bill itself for a few moments. First, as to the constitution of the Land Court. His hon. Friend explained that an agricultural Judge was to conduct the procedure of the Court in the same way as a County Court Judge. It was hardly possible he could do that, for in 99 cases out of a hundred he would have no legal knowledge, so that they would fail at once in the constitution of the Court. Then as to the appointment of the agricultural Judges. As he understood the Bill the Judges were to be recommended by the County Councils. He did not want to tread on delicate and dangerous ground, for he had to acknowledge the great moderation with which the Bill had been brought in and seconded. But most of the Welsh County Councils were—without using the term offensively—ultra-Radical, and it was only natural that their nominees, though excellent men, would be biassed by their political opinions. For his own part he certainly should not like to trust his interests in the hands of the gentlemen who would be appointed by the County Councils of Wales. Moreover, this provision would make County Council elections even more productive of bitter feeling than they had been. Then the Judges were required to speak Welsh. That would absolutely disqualify the whole of his constituency, because he did not believe there was a man in Radnorshire who spoke a solitary word of Welsh. [Laughter.] Further, the Judge must have a perfect knowledge of the district upon which he pronounced a decision. It was impossible, therefore, that they could have an agricultural Judge in his county. From the first letter of the Bill to the last, he disliked it thoroughly. [Welsh cheers.] It was as well to be straightforward. ["Hear, hear!"] He took it that the effect of the clause empowering the Court to determine fair rent and conditions of tenancy would be to abolish all existing conditions of tenancy. That meant that property was to be no longer respected, and that two sensible men were to be no longer allowed to make an agreement with each other. It was almost saying that the landlord was screwing out the highest possible rent, or that the tenant was a fool who was not capable of managing his own affairs. The Bill would do no good, certainly not in the county in which he resided, and it would cause an enormous amount of ill-feeling between landlord and tenant. Of the provisions for recasting agreements, he approved; but it did not do much to encourage free contract. The Court might refuse to record the settlement; but while he should suppose it would never do that, they had the professional agitator sometimes even in Wales, and he was not likely to calmly look on and let landlord and tenant agree—he was sure to say the terms were unreasonable. He disliked the Bill for many reasons, but chiefly because it would destroy, or partly destroy, that good feeling which now existed between landlord and tenant. The Welsh landlords wished to see their tenantry prosperous, and as far as he knew them—and he had had dealings with many of them —he had always found them deal in a most generous spirit with all their tenants. As a rule they did the whole of the improvements. ["No!"] He was speaking of the ordinary landlord. No doubt in North Wales the tenants would do a lot of improvements themselves. ["Hear, hear!" from the WELSH MEMBERS.] He should not mind seeing the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 amended so as to absolutely compensate the tenant for everything he laid out on permanent improvements. That he was entirely in favour of; but he was not in favour of a Bill that provided a third party to step in and undo that friendly feeling which had always existed. The landlords at present took an interest in their property, but what would be the effect if they practically took the whole management of their property out of their hands? They would only look on the tenant as a sort of machine for paying rent on a certain day. Then as to the tenants. If they got settled for a term of five years, how about bad times? Would the tenants have to keep their farms in repair? ["Yes!"] As far as he knew the landlord at present did the whole of the repairs, but if the tenants had to do all repairs for the five years, they would be very little better off under fair rent than they were at this moment. He opposed the Bill, and moved that it be read that day six months, because he felt certain that it would cause great ill-feeling between landlord and tenant, because it did that it would cause great ill-feeling because it would do an excessive amount of harm. Although he would willingly support anything in the shape of an Amendment of the Act of 1883, but this Bill it was impossible that he or any of his Friends should support.

Sir J. LLEWELYN (Swansea) said the views of those who had spoken for the Bill on the other side had been very temperately put before the House. It brought into the front the controversy that raged before the Land Commission in 1892-95. If hon. Gentlemen would take the trouble to read the long and interesting Report of that Commission, they would find that the principal difference between the majority and the minority of the Commissioners rested upon this very point—the question whether a Land Court was necessary or not. He for one should not be prepared to rest upon the present position of land tenure in Wales, because he thought that injustice had been done under it, and was likely to be continued unless a reform took place. But he held that a reform could be brought about by an amended Agricultural Holdings Act; and he thought it a sine quâ non that this improvement of the Agricultural Holdings Act should be passed at the earliest possible moment. They had had a promise from Her Majesty's Government that some Amendment of the law should be submitted to the House which should apply to England as to Wales; and he would venture to ask the House to bear in mind the words used in the Report of the Commission, in regard to the question of separate legislation for Wales and England. What they said was this:—

> "We had as Commissioners no right to pronounce on the question whether an amendment of the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 and of the law of landlord and tenant as to agricultural holdings is required for England as well as Wales. It was not in our reference. But, without prejudice to the question, we think that the circumstances disclosed in regard to Wales by our inquiry urgently call for legislation such as we have above sketched."

He did not intend to go back upon those words. If justice were not done to Wales by general legislation which should cover the whole of England and Wales he should then be quite prepared to support separate legislation for Wales. But how could he do this in face of the promise of the Government that the whole question should be considered as one case? He disliked separate treatment, and he thought that justice would be done to all sections in the country. In the very able and interesting speech delivered by the hon. Member for the Swansea District, they had been told that the principal differences between land tenure in Wales and England were first of all, the insatiable land hunger in Wales. He had himself been brought up from a child on landed property in Wales, and he knew what that land hunger was. If a farm were vacant he knew that in many places there would at once be a dozen applicants for it. But it had been almost the universal custom on the large estates of Wales for the tenants to occupy their farms from father to son, and there had rarely been anything in the way of an increase of rent when the occupation had been kept in the same family. In the case of a family becoming extinct—which was very rare—there was a large number of applicants for the vacant farm, and it was that which constituted land hunger. The conditions of various parts of Wales were so different that they could hardly treat those separate portions of the Principality on the same basis of equality without some consideration of the different conditions of tenure. They must deal with the strictly pastoral as compared with the agricultural parts of Wales in dealing with this question. The men throughout the whole of Wales were thrifty and hardworking, and he could not think they would like the suggestion of the hon. Member opposite who had recommended that the present system of payment of rent six months after date should be altered for a payment on the exact day that the amount fell due. The present custom had gone on from father to son, and he believed it was conceived in its inception by considerations of the best interests of the tenants themselves. If this Bill were carried, and the Land Court introduced, what would be the position of landlord and tenant? It seemed to him to follow as a matter of course that whichever of the two parties took the other into court, would do so at a time suited to his convenience. Hitherto the whole system of charging rents had been conducted by the persons who knew the circumstances best—namely, the landlord and tenant, without the intervention of a third party; and the two main objects of desiring judicial rents fixed in Wales were shattered by the conditions of the Principality. The conditions in Wales were altogether different from those which prevailed in Ireland. In the Principality, for instance, the main repairs, the buildings, outbuildings, and everything that was necessary for the occupancy of the farm were paid for by the landlord, with the exception of a few notable instances, especially in Anglesey, the interests of which county he held ought to be, and could be, safeguarded by an Amendment of the Agricultural Holdings Act. The other point, which differentiated Wales from Ireland, was that absenteeism was practically unknown in the former. Almost every landowner delighted to live among his tenantry, because of the good feeling which existed between landlord and tenant. He had a very strong impression that the introduction of a Land Court would destroy the good feeling between landlord and tenant. He did not wish to accentuate any difference of politics or religion in the controversy at all, and as some evidence had been quoted, he would quote the evidence of one witness who came before the Commission, that of Mr. Edward Davies, of Llandinam, who certainly, he believed, was neither a Tory nor a Churchman. He said that—

> "self-help and self-reliance—which are in the powers of all—are more effective than any external aid by means of legislation or otherwise."

Dealing with the question of a Land Court, Mr. Davies said:—

> "With regard to the proposal to establish a Land Court, I am of opinion that with the friction, litigation, and worry which would unavoidably be connected with it, the result would tend to place land in a worse position than any ordinary commercial enterprise. The landlord would have to look mainly to the question of return for his capital, and as that would be periodically subject to depreciation from what he would consider an arbitrary valuation, without any adequate rule, basis, or standard to guide the valuer, he would necessarily confine his expenditure upon buildings and improvements to its narrowest limit."

Further on Mr. Davies said that if a Land Court were established,

> "Then the only tolerable alternative would be for the tenant to become sole owner, for rather than submit to an uncertain valuation, which may be unjust and arbitrary, I, as a landlord, would prefer the risks of selling my property."

Mr. Davies was, he believed, one of the best landlords in Wales, but supposing that other landowners were to put their properties in the market in the same sense that Mr. Davies was prepared to recommend, there would be a widespread consternation throughout Wales, because the tenants with the freedom of contract which now obtained were much better off than they would be under any Land Court, and if they would take his advice they would keep clear of law and of lawyers. [Laughter.] It was far better for them whenever they found they could not pay their rent to go straight to their landlord, as they had done for generations and centuries past, and obtain a temporary or permanent reduction, than to go into Court, which would necessarily involve them in costs. He believed that the reason why the Agricultural Holdings Act of 1883 had been inoperative was because tenants had been afraid to go into Court, as they knew perfectly well that costs were involved by such a procedure. They had in the past rested upon the good feeling which existed between landlord and tenant rather than resort to a proceeding which would inevitably result in legal expense. The Bill appeared to him to open a new way by which law costs would be incurred, and, while it might be food for the lawyers, it would be poison to the farmers.

On the return of Mr. Speaker, after the usual interval,

*Mr. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire) said that he supported the Second Reading of this Bill because he could see no other way of extricating Welsh farmers from the ruinous position in which they were placed. Their rents were far too high.

Their capital had been almost exhausted by the vain attempt to pay these impossible rents, and the system of agriculture had deteriorated very much for want of farming capital and from the wretched system of yearly tenancy that prevailed. The Returns collected by the Land Commission showed conclusively how impossibly high the rents were. The rise of rents in all England from 1815 to 1893 was 16·3 per cent., but in Wales and Monmouthshire it was 63·2 per cent. The fall from the highest point of rent was 18 per cent. in England, and 6·3 per cent. in Wales and Monmouthshire. The real cause of this difference was not the character of the agriculture, but the land hunger in Wales, and the opportunity it gave of exacting unreasonable rents. There was a very close analogy between the condition of Welsh farming now, and that of Ireland before the Land Acts of Mr. Gladstone. The excessive competition for land in Ireland enabled the landlords to screw impossible rents out of the poor peasantry. So it was in Wales today. The absence of leases, or of security for tenants' improvements made good farming impossible in Ireland, and so it was in Wales to-day. The landlords in Ireland belonged to a different Church, and different side of politics from their tenants; so it was in Wales to-day. The Welsh farmers were usually Nonconformists and Liberals; the landlords were Anglicans and Tories. There was incessant friction in Ireland, and a miserable social condition; it was less so in Wales, but still there was far too much of it. The elementary fact in both cases was that there was no security against excessive rents and capricious evictions in Wales any more than there was in Ireland, and as peace and contentment had been secured to Ireland by a system of judicial rents, so it would be in Wales. In support of these views he would quote from the Report of the Land Commission:—

> "But though there are points of difference between the condition of Ireland and the condition of Wales, yet there are many points of resemblance. There is the same land hunger exhibited in almost, if not quite, as great a degree. There is the same attachment to the native land, and to the pursuit of farming under the same traditional conditions. There is much of the same divergence in temperament, idiosyncracy, and habits between the actual cultivators of the soil and the aristocratic class who own the land. There is the same hostility, more veiled but not less felt, to the agents of the landlord. Religious and social differences between the cultivators and the owners are just as well marked in Wales as they were in Ireland, if, indeed, not more highly developed. There is the same fear among the tenants that they may be ousted from homes to which they are passionately attached. There is the same conviction that the pressure of legal rules and economic circumstances is depriving them unjustly of the fruits of their labour."

He could assert from his knowledge of his own constituency that the farmers were being ground to death between the upper and nether millstones of excessive rents and excessive competition for land. In many cases the farmer and his whole family toiled on the land from early morn till dark, and earned far less than they could get as agricultural labourers; their food was very poor, they were poorly clad, and had no luxuries; and no class of people in Great Britain got so small a reward for their industry. Most farms were still held at the high rents of 20 years ago, with occasional rebates of 10 and sometimes of 15 per cent., which were already being reduced in proportion to the relief given by the Agricultural Rating Act of last year; but if the tenants were dealt with on the same plan as Irish tenants, the reductions would be not 10 or 15 per cent., but 40 per cent. He also advocated the change on social grounds. The very backbone of a country was its agricultural population. The true policy of any country should be to keep a large population on the land, and to encourage the best farming possible. The policy of this country had been just the opposite: hence the depletion of the agricultural population and the enormous increase of our cities. The greatest economical reform of the future would be that which would attract population to the soil and develop its resources to the largest extent possible. This policy should be applied to all parts of the United Kingdom; but at the present moment it was most imperatively demanded in Wales. They had the advantage of the Report of a Land Commission representing all classes, and the Government were asked to give effect to the Report of that Commission, which was embodied in the Bill now before the House. ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry) said that as the hon. Member had no connection with Wales, except political, he suggested that this Bill was applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom. Then why was not the Bill brought forward for the whole of England? ["Hear, hear!"] He believed that he was the only man in the House who had read the Report of the Welsh Land Commission. [Cries of "No," and laughter.] At any rate, no one could could have read it who had not very ample leisure. It was a remarkable report written in seven languages—Greek, Latin, French, German, Ogmic, Celtic, and a little English. [Laughter.] And still the wonder grew, that nine small heads could carry all they knew. [Laughter.] The first recommendation was that Her Majesty should put the Record Office in order, although there was not a single manuscript in Welsh in that office. The next inquiry was whether there were Goidels in Wales, or whether there was a Pre-Goidelic nationality; a third question turned upon a point of comparative philology which was thus treated: The Goidelic for who is in Manx Gaelic quei, quoi, but in Welch pwy: compare Latin quī, quis, Oscan pis, accusative pim. Similarly the Goidelic for five is in Manx queig, but in Welch pump (and pimp). Compare Latin quinque, whence the derivatives quintus 'fifth,' Quintus (for quinctus, Quinctus), and Quinctus, Quintius, which we have as an Oscan name in Πομπτιες, Latinized Pomptius, and Pontius as in the well-known name of the Samnite Pontius Pilate. The relative morality of the Pictish and Roman ladies was illustrated by a quotation from Dion Cassius; and then followed chapters on the Ogmic alphabet, the orographical survey of Wales, and its geological, biological, municipal, and climatic conditions. A personal inspection of the tombstones in the graveyards of Wales enabled the Commissioners to produce original evidence of the longevity of the inhabitants. [Laughter.] Perhaps some hon. Member would be good enough to inform the House how all this affected the hill-side farms of Wales. ["Hear, hear!"] The Report then passed to the laws of Howell the Good, in the 10th century, and made this important discovery—that no value was attached to a hare in old days because the hare had two sexes which changed every month. [Laughter.] If the Commissioners could show that this applied to the higher animals in Wales, they would have established some foundation for differentiation of Wales from the rest of the United Kingdom, and perhaps in favour of female suffrage itself. [Laughter.] The Report next dealt fully with the strange habits of the Welsh people described as "streccio," "cnocio," "fenstern," and "bundling," and illustrated the improved morality of the Welsh by stating that now it was a disgrace to be found drunk—drawing a fine distinction between being drunk and getting drunk and being found out. [Laughter.] The manner in which the Welsh spent their Sunday next engaged the attention of the Commissioners, ending by a description of a religious revival in these words:—

> "The whole congregation is either moved to exceeding ecstasy under a vivid realisation of things invisible, or uncontrollable terror by discovery of their lost condition."

At last he came to a real oasis in the desert—a chapter on the subject of rent and ownership. It was stated that:—

> "In the King and Queen of England is vested the eminent domain or paramount ownership of the soil. . . . An estate is an economic unit, an industrial and organic entity having a life of its own."

All of which was very helpful. [Laughter.] Then ten pages were devoted to Professor Walker on Ricardo's "Theory of Rent," and there was a whole chapter on John Stuart Mill's "Political Economy." The Commissioners, however, were good enough to put into a nutshell the whole theory of rent so that any stupid man might comprehend it. They said:—

> "Now assume Y exceeds X by Z." [Laughter.] "Then if the landlord claims Z as rent and that is payable, there is no interest on the tenant's capital and he is a loser. If Z is so large that a fair interest can be paid on capital A, then the surplus can be paid to the landlord."

[Laughter.] After that every one must know what was a fair economic rent. [Laughter.] From those premises the Commissioners came to the conclusion that the agricultural conditions of England and Wales were identical, and that the Welsh rents had not been reduced in the same proportion as rents in England. Let them hear for themselves the real facts taken from the income tax returns. In Monmouth the reduction had been 16·2; in Devonshire, 13·9; in Denbigh, 14·7; in Westmorland, 13·8; in Radnor, 13·4; in Cumberland, 12·1; in Brecon, 12·8; in Cornwall, 6·2: ; in Flint, 11·7; and in Cheshire, 6·07. On those figures he charged the Commissioners with an untrue statement, the Commissioners asserted that the agricultural depression in Wales was identical with the depression in England. But Mr. Doyle, a most impartial authority, a Poor Law Inspector, and a Radical, said in his evidence before the Richmond Commission:—"The depression is neither so severe nor so general in Wales as in England." Next came the assertion that such was the land hunger in Wales and the competition for farms that the tenants had no chance. Mr. Doyle, on the contrary, stated that "the almost exclusive use of the Welsh language amongst the class of small farmers gives Welshmen in far-away parts almost a monopoly of land-holding;" and he went on to say, "The restricted competition for farms compels owners in too many cases to accept undesirable tenants." The fondness of the Welsh people for home and their dislike to migrate had been dwelt on by several hon. Members in the course of the Debate. But Mr. Doyle asserted that the younger members of Welsh families emigrate and migrate without hesitation. Another thing they did; when they crossed the border they rarely came back. [Laughter.] It was with a blush that he had read in the Report of the Commission, "strapping Welsh wenches were in great demand in London." [Laughter.] He did not wish to minimise Welsh agricultural grievances. He participated in them himself. Nor did he wish that any one should suppose that depression had not been heavy on the Welsh tenant. ["Hear, hear!"] But what did the Bill do to remedy their condition? In the first place, it abolished freedom of contract, which was the mainstay of the agricultural industry, and the greatest safeguard to the tenants. The effect of the Bill would be to raise rents on all those estates where rents were below the average. He believed it had already created widespread alarm amongst the tenants, because on many of the large estates in Wales the rents were below the average of rents around. The Bill would lead to wholesale ejectment of farmers whose methods of farming was below the average. The Commissioners in their Report declared that the average farmer in Wales did not do justice to the land, because he was hindered by want of capital, want of education and want of energy. He would not follow the example of members of the Commission by throwing dirt on the Welsh tenantry. ["Hear, hear!"] Again, the Bill proposed to create a triple ownership, that of the landlord, that of the tenant, and that of the County Court. The tenant would be under two sets of agents, the Commission having declared that no one individual could combine all the qualities necessary in a good agent. Rents were to be fixed by guesswork. The promoters of the Bill had not the courage or intelligence to say how a fair rent should be assessed, and they got out of the difficulty by not stating any method, standard, or principle. The Bill discouraged improvements. The owner had to apply to the Court for leave to build a cottage, to grant an allotment, to make a cottage garden, or even to build a house for himself. The Bill altogether ignored the interests of the labourer, and divorced him from the possibility of getting a farm, and the Commissioners said that his interests were irreconcilable with those of the farmer. The agitation of the past few years had had a most prejudicial effect already. The actual result stated in his evidence by Mr. Morgan Richardson was disastrous to the yeoman farmer:—

> "The difficulties which have been suggested with regard to the Welsh land tenure, and the suggestions which have been made for a land court, have, I may say, prejudiced these freeholders to a very great extent, because the rate of interest has proportionately increased. People have no longer that confidence in investing in land that they had eight or ten years ago. I may say that five or six years ago, before a Welsh land question was heard of, we were frequently offered, personally, by London solicitors, large sums of money at 3 and 3½ per cent. to lend on land in Wales, because the interest was so punctually paid that it was supposed to be a very first-rate investment. But since this agitation has commenced for a Land Court, a great many of those mortgages have been called in, and I find it quite impossible to get the money in again at those same rates."

In the meantime the real grievances of the farmers and their demands were ignored. They were, foreign competition, since 1871, unfair local and Imperial taxation, unfair railway rates, inadequate means of transport, and amendment of the Agricultural Holdings Act. But all those questions were ignored by the Commissioners, and they fell back upon such sententious commonplaces as:—

> "The principal lesson to be learnt from the history of mankind and the observations of society at the present time is that by the application of practical intelligence to the stored-up treasures of knowledge, and by skilful organisations, casualties may be diminished and their results minimised."

[Laughter.] A schoolboy would have been flogged for writing such stuff in a theme. [Laughter.] They went on:—

> "We represent to your Majesty that the Welsh people are a specially interesting portion of your Majesty's subjects—"

[Laughter]; and,

> "please your Majesty they are stout, valiant, courteous, hospitable, temperate, ingenious, capable of all good arts, lovingly constant, charitable, great antiquaries, religious preservers of their gentry and genealogy, as they are zealous and knowing in religion."

[Laughter.] Was ever such a Report presented to Parliament? Was ever such a hotch-potch of pedantic irrelevancies composed by "our trusty and well-beloved"? [Laughter.]

> "Oh could some sprite the giftie gie 'em
> To see themselves as ithers see 'em."

[Laughter.] But it would be of no use. If they were presented with a pier-glass they would only turn their backs. [Laughter.] For they belonged to that hopeless family whom Mr. Bunyan describes as "hailing from the town of Stupidity, which lyeth hard by the City of Destruction." [Laughter and cheers.]

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.) said that it was impossible to seriously treat the speech of the hon. Member, but he must repeat the assertion that there had been a greater reduction of rents in England than there had been in Wales. He represented a constituency which had taken a very leading part in the recent development of this question. In Denbighshire a number of the most notable events in connection with this matter had recently taken place. This land question in Wales was not a class question. It was of such vital interest to the country at large that it could be truly said that so far as Wales was concerned it was a national question. It was not until 1880 that there was in the House any adequate representation of the views of the Welsh tenant farmers on the question, and the Royal Commission was the result of the declaration in 1892 by Mr. Gladstone on the Welsh Land Bill that no further steps should be taken until the feeling of Wales and the circumstances of Wales had been officially tested in some way. He laid the greatest stress and importance upon the fact that the unanimous opinion of the Commission was in favour of treating the land question in Wales in a separate Bill. There was no question, therefore, as to whether they should have separate legislation in Wales on the land question. The only question before them was what sort of legislation they should have specially for Wales upon this point. What had led up to the present position as regarded land in Wales? They had first of all historically the cardinal fact that in Wales Welsh nationality had been in conflict with the land-owning class in the country, and then they had the second fact that there had been in Wales two separate land systems which had become practically assimilated; but the tenants still retained a number of ideas belonging to the older system. One further line of cleavage between Welsh landlords and their tenants was that there had been greater friction and greater disagreement owing to religious, political, and social differences. The period since 1850 to 1880 of more or less agricultural prosperity, saw in Wales a spirit of independence grow among the farmers to a greater extent than in England, and that was met by persecution and eviction, and the evictions connected with the election of 1868 would never be forgotten. [Cheers.] He asserted without fear of contradiction that from 1880 up to 1896 the depression in Wales had been more acute than in England owing to many circumstances. But these were only the external sympathies of the case. What was the inner history of the question? The Bill promoted two things—security of tenure and fair rent. He did not think it had been pointed out as yet that in reference to the question of security of tenure in Wales the proportion of occupying tenants to owners of land was much larger than it was in England. The frequent leasing of wealthy estates that had come into considerable prominence during the past few years had added not a little to the sense of insecurity felt by the tenant farmers of Wales in reference to their right to hold their farms. But undoubtedly, as had been pointed out, land hunger was very much felt among the tenant farmers of Wales. The holdings in Wales were smaller than in England, and there was more competition for farms. There were scores, if not hundreds of farmers in Wales who cultivated mountain sides, which it was impossible for them beneficially to cultivate, simply because of the insatiable hunger for land. These facts substantiated the claim embodied in this Bill that the security of land tenure as far as Wales was concerned had a character of its own. Rents in Wales were too high, and ought to be lowered. Reasonable conditions of tenancy on estates owned by certain hon. Members opposite were the exception and not the rule in Wales. This question of land reform in Wales was not only important because agriculture remained the most important industry in the country, but because in Wales they attached special value to rural life. It was from the agricultural classes and from the rural community that in the past the Welsh people had drawn their leaders and teachers, and it was to that class of the community they looked for the mainspring of their national life. He entirely agreed with his hon. Friend in saying that they could not sit down with folded arms and watch the decadence and gradual extinction of this valuable element in their national life without making some honest effort on behalf of the tenant farmers of Wales. He trusted that the principle of the Bill, if not ratified that day, would at no distant time be ratified by a large majority in the House of Commons. [" Hear, hear ! "]

Colonel LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said that besides having Welsh blood in his veins he possessed a small estate in Wales, chiefly remarkable for the extreme regularity and honesty with which the tenants had paid their rents. The estate had been hundreds of years in his family and never had evictions taken place. He believed this was typical of other estates in Wales. In the Debate they had heard little of the necessity for the Bill, or the peculiarities of it. He believed there was no necessity for the Bill. It was impossible to separate the land question from politics in Wales. He could not think hon. Members were in earnest in producing this Bill. He gave them credit for too much common sense to believe that even in a House composed differently a Bill of that kind would be accepted. It was a reconnaissance in force to ascertain what arguments would be used against the Bill that in the future a Bill framed perhaps more moderately might be brought in. The Mover of the Bill complained that no notice was given of abatements of rent frequently given by Welsh landlords. In that there was no difference between Wales and England. It would be more convenient if notice were given that abatements would continue ten or fifteen years or more, but he could not see that Welsh tenants had any reason to complain if he got the abatement generally given by the landlords in Wales. With regard to the "showers of political evictions" which it was said had prevailed on some estates, he trusted that when the hon. Member considered the matter a little more he would acknowledge that he had drawn the long bow a little too far. He could find no evidence of them. He regretted that the hon. Member abused the new idea of conciliation. No one regretted that it had not been more successful than he did, but he hoped that in future conciliation and voluntary effort would enter more largely into the relations of landlords and tenants in Wales. As to the judges, who it was proposed should have charge of the Land Court, the hon. Member surely could not think that Members on the Government side of the House, or even Welsh landlords, would look without suspicion on a body of men chosen on the recommendation of the Welsh County Councils. The County Councils had done excellent work, and had shown that knowledge of business inherent in every Welshman, but as a landlord he would regard with more than suspicion a body of men whose principal recommendation was that they had been chosen by the Welsh County Councils. It had not been proved that a Bill so drastic as this was required, and that if it was required that this Bill was so drawn as to do justice to both parties. Up to the present time he had not heard that made out or proved, and until it was it would be impossible for him to accept such a Bill.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) said the hon. Member who had just spoken had based his conclusion with regard to the land question on his own experience. If the Welsh landlords were all so genial and kindly a type as the last speaker, he had no hesitation in saying that the agitation for land reform would never have gathered sufficient force to justify the bringing in of a Bill of this character. ["Hear, hear!"] But if the hon. Member had perused the evidence given before the Commission, he would have found that that was not the case. The hon. Member had referred to the Report of the minority, but it was a remarkable fact that both the majority and minority Reports agreed that there were very considerable grievances that required redressing in an exceedingly drastic manner. The evidence must have been singularly strong to cause the minority to come to such a conclusion. The only question between the two parties was a question of degree. It was suggested that the Agricultural Holdings Act ought to be amended and a Court of Conciliation set up; but surely that was a very novel departure in the history of agricultural legislation. They had heard a great deal about freedom of contract, but hon. Members opposite proposed to interfere with freedom of contract. The only difference between them was as to the extent to which they were going to interfere with freedom of contract. He was surprised that arguments in favour of freedom of contract had been advanced from the other side of the House, especially after the very sweeping Bill that was passed unanimously yesterday, the first provision of which was that employer and employed should not be allowed to enter into contracts with regard to the question of compensation for injuries except under very restricted conditions. The hon. Member for Radnorshire said that if they interfered with freedom of contract between landlord and tenant they assumed that the landlord was a knave and the tenant a fool; but, on that assumption, the Compensation for Workmen Bill of the Government treated employers as knaves and the employés as fools. He challenged any hon. Member to point to any difference of principle in this respect between the two Bills. Again, the minority Report and the hon. Member for Swansea admitted that there were cases which rendered it necessary to amend the Agricultural Holdings Act. But why did they not trust to freedom of contract in that case? Why was it necessary to amend the Agricultural Holdings Act? Because it was assumed that there were landlords who would deal unfairly with their tenants, when they quitted their holdings would not pay them fair compensation, and confiscate property that belonged to the tenant. What was the difference between that and the position taken up by the promoters of this Bill? The argument of the supporters of the Bill was that there were landlords who dealt as unfairly with their sitting tenants as with their quitting tenants. ["Hear, hear!"] Moreover, the quitting tenant was a perfectly free agent, but the sitting tenant was absolutely in the hands of his landlord and not in a position to enter into a free contract. ["Hear, hear!"] If they were going to interfere with the freedom of contract in one case, on what principle should they refrain from doing so in the other? Hon. Gentlemen opposite said that the quitting tenant must be protected. The promoters of the Bill contended that there was so much rack-renting in Wales that the sitting tenant must also be protected. ["Hear, hear!"] The land hunger in Wales was admitted by both parties, and the minority in the Commission admitted the hard lot of the Welsh tenant. There was a case referred to in the Report of a farm rented at £200. There had been no reduction in the rent, only a remission of 10 per cent. once or twice. The tenant had six children, ranging from 18 to 29, who worked like slaves on the farm. A question was put to the farmer:—"Have you paid them wages for their services?" And he answered, "No; they are not clothed as they should be, and their shoes are worse than their clothes." That seemed to amuse the hon. Member for Shropshire.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I assure the hon. Member I did not smile.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I did not refer to the hon. Member. There is another Member for Shropshire.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): My smile had no reference whatever to what the hon. Member was saying. At the moment I was not listening to what he said. ["Hear, hear!"]

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE said he was sorry if he had misunderstood the hon. and gallant Gentleman's smile. The Report was teeming with cases of that kind. The Commissioners admitted the grievance, and all that was now asked was that as a tenant leaving his farm was protected, the tenant remaining on his farm should also be protected. Until that was done there would never be a prosperous state of things in Wales. ["Hear, hear!"]

*SIR W. HART-DYKE (Kent, Dartford) said that the Mover and Seconder of the Bill had spoken with moderation, but had not advanced a jot or tittle of argument in favour of the merits of the Measure. Those hon. Gentlemen and others had referred to the land hunger in Wales, and had asserted that the fear of losing their holdings poisoned the whole existence of the Welsh farmers. He was sure that his hon. Friends who represented Essex, and other English agricultural counties, would be thankful if some of their tenants were inoculated with such a poison. ["Hear, hear!"] He refused to regard this Measure as simply a Welsh Measure, inasmuch as the bases of the land systems of England and the Principality were identical, and the Bill might with just as much justice be applied to Sussex, Norfolk, and other English counties where different customs prevailed, as to Wales. In the first place the Bill proposed to create dual ownership. That would be a very revolutionary change, but if a similar experiment had not been tried in recent years, something might, in face of the difficulty and danger which now beset agriculture, be said for it. Surely, of all times to choose at which to make such a proposal, this was the very worst. When he introduced his Irish Land Bill of 1870, Mr. Gladstone promised Ireland, as a result of passing that Measure, everlasting peace between landlord and tenant, but in 1881 another Act was passed which produced a state of things so absurd and chaotic that another Land Act was passed last Session, and this year a Commission was to issue, to inquire into the relations between landlord and tenant. In support of the creation of dual ownership in Ireland, two grievances were advanced—the absenteeism of the landlords and the fact that all improvements fell on the tenants. No such grievances could be alleged in the case of Wales—indeed, no charge was made against the existing Welsh landlords. ["Hear, hear!"] If, however, Parliament passed the dual ownership clause, no landlord in Wales would spend a single farthing on the improvement of his property, and the result must necessarily be disadvantageous to the agricultural industry. Then, again, the proposal for the setting up of a Court was so ridiculous that it was really a waste of the time of the House to discuss it. Did hon. Members honestly believe that the Court they were proposing to establish could ever work to the benefit of either landlord or tenant? The proposition was that the County Councils of Wales should furnish the Board of Agriculture with a list of names of gentlemen, and that the Board should choose from the list a certain number of gentlemen who should become agricultural judges, possessing full judicial powers. In view of the mode of selection, could it be imagined for a moment that such a Court would work smoothly or that there would be no legal or political strife? He was reminded that 13 or 14 of the Welsh representatives belonged to the legal profession, and therefore it was not difficult for him to understand the presence of Clause 11 in the Bill. That clause provided that the parties might appear in Court and be represented by Counsel. Under such circumstances, he thought that the Bill might be regarded as a lawyers' relief Bill rather than a tenants' relief Bill. ["Hear, hear!"] Another clause provided for fixity of tenure, but his experience as a landlord was that the adverse circumstances of the day had in a sense produced fixity of tenure as regards every good tenant. Any landlord, either in England or Wales, who proposed to get rid of a good tenant, ought to be relegated to the nearest county lunatic asylum. [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite had urged again and again that rents had been more largely reduced in England than in Wales during all these bad agricultural seasons. His hon. Friend the Member for Shropshire had shown many cases in which there had been larger reductions in Wales than in England, but, whether that was so or not, he submitted there was a grave distinction between the two cases. For instance, he believed that sheep-farming had paid and did pay at the present moment in Wales, and, also, there was a system of small holdings in Wales which had been largely beneficial to the Welsh tenants throughout this great crisis. So far as this Bill was concerned, revolutionary as it was in its proposals, there was not even the same demand for it, from an economic point of view, in Wales, as there was in England. The hon. Member for Swansea asked for the regulation of the agricultural industry, but, to his mind, Bills of this kind would create such a disastrous state of things between landlord and tenant that they would simply regulate the industry to death. They would upset the whole system of land tenure root and branch. He believed that such a Bill as this would settle nothing as between landlord and tenant or as to the future of agriculture. On the other hand, he believed it would create so much strife as would be a serious injury to every tenant in Wales, and, what was more, to the whole agricultural community both in England and Wales. Therefore, he should vote against the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. F. A. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) said that, as a Member of the Royal Commission on Agricultural Depression, the Welsh evidence given before them seemed to him to fully justify the demand for the present Bill. The right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had, he thought, exaggerated the effect of the Measure. ["Hear, hear!"] He should like to correct the impression he had conveyed to the House, that this Bill created dual ownership in the same way as in Ireland. He did not think the right hon. Gentleman had considered the effect of Clause 24, which gave the right of pre-emption to the landlord for purposes of his own. The landlord had, with a year's notice, the right at any time to terminate these judicial tenancies, giving in that case compensation for disturbance to the tenant who was dispossessed. With that condition in the Bill, it was hardly fair to say that they were creating a perpetual judicial tenancy in the same sense which was created in Ireland. He would also like to say that the Minority Report went even further, in certain cases, than the suggestions embodied in the Bill. The Minority, including the hon. Baronet the Member for Swansea, reported that, where an estate owner had died or where there had been a transfer in the ownership of the estate, the tenant should not be open to a notice to quit with one year's notice, but should have a three years' run of his tenancy. That seemed to him a very important recommendation to have been made by the landlord interest upon the Welsh Land Commission. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said this was a Bill to transfer the property of the landlord to the tenant. His opinion, on the contrary, was that it was suggested in order to provide machinery to prevent the appropriation of what the Agricultural Holdings Act had always recognised to be the property of the tenant by the landlord under the present land system. Having carefully considered the Report of the minority as well as of the majority of the Welsh Land Commission, it seemed to him there was very little difference between one point of view, and the suggestions made, and the other as to the class of machinery which was necessary in order to accurately and equitably divide the interests of the landlord from the interests of the tenant, and to protect the interest of the tenant in his improvements and in his tenure from being appropriated. Mr. Pennant, a gentleman of very great ability and experience in these matters, was examined before both the Land Commission and the Agricultural Depression Committee, and he recognised that it was essential to consider the best type of agriculturists—those who threw long-continued work and skill and energy and the accumulated resources of their own into the development of the fertility of the land as contrasted with tenants who farmed from hand to mouth. Mr. Pennant also dwelt on the necessity of creating a new type of agricultural landlord—a man who was of the very highest class of agricultural expert—and his suggestion was that these men should practically be given full power to decide as between the interests of the landlord and tenant in all these matters of improvements, of tenure, of conditions of tenancy, and so on. It seemed to him that when a suggestion of that kind was practically adopted by the Minority representing the landlords on the Welsh Land Commission, it created a very serious and practical situation which the House of Commons ought to take into consideration in dealing with proposals of this kind. This Bill might strike some Members opposite as being a very stringent and very drastic proposal of land tenure reform. All he could say was that the Agricultural Depression Commission had the strongest possible evidence, both from England and Wales, that the position of the best class of tenants, men who ought to be protected by the law of the land in the enjoyment of their improvements, was exceedingly precarious. It seemed to him it was the duty of the House of Commons to provide some adequate machinery, both in the interest of agriculture as well as in the interest of individuals, for protecting the tenant farmer and giving encouragement to the development of work on the land, and the application of capital to the land. His own opinion was that the depression in Wales would have been much less acute than it had been found to be if there had been an adequate and sufficiently prompt reduction of rent in proportion to the fall in prices. It seemed to him that in Wales and in Scotland the conditions of agricultural depression had been greatly aggravated by the fact that there had been keen competition for land, and rents had been kept up owing to competition being taken as the measure of value—kept up to such a point as to gradually sweep all possible profits out of the pockets of the tenants into the pockets of the landlords, so that in addition to the depression arising from natural causes the tenants had suffered from a form of depression that was largely due to the persistent high renting of their farms.

*MR. W. T. HOWELL (Denbigh Boroughs) said that, as representing a Welsh constituency, he felt that he ought to say in a few words why he opposed the Bill. He regarded it as a more revolutionary measure than any which hon. Members on the opposite side had hitherto brought before the House. It tended to deprive the landlord of the control of his property, and to interfere with freedom of contract. When a revolutionary Bill like that was brought forward, which struck away the essential basis of the land system in Wales, the House was entitled to ask for convincing arguments, for strong facts, and for conclusive figures, before it allowed such a drastic Measure to be passed. He must confess that he had listened to the Debate, and he had sought in declarations made outside the House, but he had failed to find anything like convincing arguments, strong facts, or conclusive figures that would show a reasonable man bringing his judgment to bear on the condition of agriculture in Wales that any existing grievances or difficulties were going to be remedied, and could only be remedied, by a Land Court. The hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs had challenged them on the Government side of the House to show where the distinction was between the Bill which passed through the House last evening to that now submitted to it. He took up the challenge with cheerfulness. Where was the parallel between the two Measures? It was about the most absurd parallel he had ever heard brought forward in argument. In the case of the injured workman they had already got a liability upon the employer; the workman had been injured, there was the liability to pay, and conciliation was only applied to fix the amount. The employer was already bound to pay something, but the landlord was not bound to let his land. Had the Government brought forward a Bill to settle the rates of wages, there would have been some parallel; but there was no parallel between the Workmen's Compensation Bill and the Bill they were now discussing. ["Hear, hear!"] Passing to the grounds upon which it was suggested that this Bill ought to become law, the first thing that struck him was the emphasis laid on the fact that there was a land hunger in Wales. He was ready to admit, for the sake of argument, that there was a land hunger in Wales. ["Hear, hear!"] But the extraordinary part of it was that this Bill as framed would in no way affect that land hunger. And for this reason. The land hunger was supposed to be the cause of the competition for holdings. Under the Bill a tenant might still make a voluntary agreement with the landlord, and they could take that into Court and make it an order of the Court. Gentlemen opposite would see at once that what would happen if this land hunger existed was this. The tenant who wished to get a certain holding would induce the landlord to select him by offering an excessive rent. If that was so, this Bill would not, at any rate, deal with the land hunger. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Members opposite had made a great deal of the fact that the majority of the Welsh Land Commission reported in favour of a Land Court. But that did not carry much weight, at any rate, in the Principality itself, because for some reason—possibly because the political tendencies of the majority were known before ever they set foot in Wales—it was felt that the constitution of the Commission was such that, in all probability, a Land Court would be the result. Hon. Members opposite must know that was the fact, that the general expectation in Wales was that the Commission would recommend the establishment of a Land Court. Further than that, the procedure of some of the members of the Commission showed that they had in their minds the idea of a Land Court before they had inquired into the opinions of the tenants. He would prove this by quoting part of the examination of a witness by the Chairman of that Commission, showing that the Chairman had the idea of a Land Court in his mind and was leading the witness into acquiescing, not only in a Land Court, but in a Land Court of exactly the kind the Chairman had conceived in his own mind. The witness was a retired master mariner who had left the sea and taken to farming. He was a witness in favour of a Land Court, and this was how his evidence was elicited, as it never could have been elicited in a Court of Law. The Chairman said:—

> "You told us you wished for a Land Court. Now is it for this reason? Would you like to see a Land Court established that you could refer to if you thought your rent higher than it ought to be, and the landlord thought it was a fair rent? Is that what you mean?"

The witness said "Yes." Then the Chairman:—

> "A sort of Court that you could refer to of practical men who would decide, and whose decision would be final and legal, as to what rent you were to pay?"

The witness, "Yes." The Chairman:—

> "As for fixity of tenure, I suppose you mean that so long as you paid that rent and farmed in a husbandlike manner, you should be secured in your holding and able to live on that holding so long as you carried out the conditions imposed on you by the Court?"

The witness, "Yes." The House would notice how the Chairman had suggested all the essentials of a Land Court to the witness, and the witness was simply acquiescing in the description of Land Court the Chairman had conceived in his own mind. [Replying to an hon. Member below the Gangway, Mr. HOWELL said the name of the witness was Captain Badcock, and the number of the question at which he began was 3,764.] The Chairman, he continued, was not satisfied still; he had not got quite enough evidence out of his acquiescing witness, and he went on to ask another question:—

> "And besides that you wish the Court to adjudicate on any losses from game or losses from timber-felling that you might be subject to, and that the landlord might decline to pay. You would refer those sort of questions to the Land Court as well?"

The witness replied, "Yes, my Lord." He had taken the trouble to find out how much the Chairman had spoken, and how much the witness spoke—this witness who was asking for the Land Court described. Altogether the witness spoke six words to 188 words from the Chairman. [Laughter.] Four times the witness said "Yes," and once he said "My Lord." [Laughter.]

MR. BRYNMOR JONES: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether, in that case, the proof of the witness had not been handed to the Chairman? ["Hear, hear!"]

*MR. HOWELL: I am not aware one way or the other. It may be so, but I am taking the evidence as it is printed and published for the information of this House. What may have happened before the Commission I do not know; but here we have the evidence as it is given, and extracted from the witness by a series of leading questions. At any rate, that is the form on which the evidence is given in the Report, and I must leave the explanation to hon. Gentlemen opposite. Continuing, he said they had heard much about the excess of rents in Wales; but if hon. Members would take the trouble to read the Report—a great volume of hundreds of pages—they would see how timid the Commissioners were in bringing any allegation of excessive rents against the Welsh landlords, and they would see that the case for excessive rents which had been made outside the House was not a fair representation of the condition of things in Wales. He would read an extract from the Report of the Commission, on page 898. What the Commissioners were bold enough to say about excessive rents was this:—

> "The majority of landlords do not, according to their own view, demand higher than fair rent."

Those were the Commissioners' own words. And what said a witness who had as much weight with the Commission as any witness before them—Major Birch, a land agent of the county of Denbigh. Now, Major Birch happened to be a land agent in England as well as in Wales, and he thought the members of the Commission would say he gave his evidence in a perfectly fair and straightforward manner. What did he say? Comparing his experience in England and Wales, he said that—

> "rents in Wales were lower than in England, and that more was done for the tenant in Wales than was done in England."

That was Major Birch's comparison of the condition of things as between England and Wales. He must suggest to the House that this was a very serious matter for Wales, because they were going to have a Court set up to stand between landlord and tenant with a Judge who was bound by no sort of law whatever. The Judges of the Courts at present had to administer the law; they were bound by it, and if they went outside it their decisions could be appealed from and upset. It seemed absurd to put these men on the same footing, and clothe them as Judges. They were, as he had said, bound by no law, but were to be local dictators in the matter of the land. Their functions would not be judicial, but more those of a witness in an ordinary action. To call such men Judges was an abuse of the term. These Judges were going to fix fair rents without any suggestion of what kind of principle they were to act upon, and without the slightest restraint put upon them. And who were going to appoint these men? They were to be appointed by the County Councils. It was perfectly well known that in a large number of the present County Councils in Wales the tenant farmers had a majority of the Councillors; so that it was the farmer who was going to draw up the list of the Judges who were going to sit over him in connection with agricultural matters, and all the Board of Agriculture could do would be to choose between A, B, C, and D. It was said that the effect of these Courts would not be so bad as the effect in Ireland, because they were going to prohibit free sale. But they were going to allow a man to get such a tenant right as he could devolve by will to his children. Once having found that their tenant right was worth money, how long did they think the farmers would be content? They would say they were allowed to dispose of their property by will, and would come forward and say if it was their property it was unjust they should not have the right to sell it, and immediately a section of hon. Members on the other side of the House would be found to support them in that claim. If the Land Courts were established, they would immediately have an agitation for the right of the tenant to free sale, and have all those ills which had resulted from the free sale of tenant right in Ireland. It seemed to him that this was a particularly inopportune time for Gentlemen opposite to suggest the establishment of a Welsh Land Court, this being the very moment when both sides were condemning the Courts established in Ireland under the Land Act of 1881. He could only think hon. Members opposite, in bringing the matter forward at the present time, were rather of the description of reformers spoken of by the Colonial Secretary the other night, namely, the reformers who wished to punish. These reformers wished to punish the landlords of Wales who came with flying colours out of the great test put to them by the Land Commission. And why? Simply and solely because they happened to be capitalists with their capital invested in land.

*MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomery) observed that, as a resident landlord in Wales, he could claim to have a somewhat better acquaintance with the subject of the Bill than most hon. Members opposite, with the exception of the hon. Member for Swansea Boroughs. He thought it was typical of this discussion and illustrative of the reasons which called for it, that of the two Motions for the rejection of the Bill, one had been moved by an hon. Member who was a recent immigrant into Wales, and the other by the hon. Member for Tunbridge, who was an emigrant from Wales, and had gone, as far as geographical circumstances would admit, to find a constituency away from Wales. He supported the Bill from the point of view of one who wished to raise the social condition of the tenants. Nothing had struck him more painfully during his acquaintance with Wales than the condition of subjection and social inferiority in which the tenants felt themselves. He agreed with hon. Members who objected to interference with freedom of contract so far as this, that he thought anybody who proposed to interfere with freedom of contract was bound to justify that course. He submitted to the House that the conditions which required an interference with freedom of contract existed in Wales to an extent that did not exist in England. Taking poverty, 80 per cent. of the occupiers in Wales had holdings above five and under 200 acres. Assuming, therefore, that 15s. an acre was the average rent, and that the rule held good that the tenant's income equalled the rent (both favourable assumptions for his opponents), it followed that the bulk of the tenants had at the outside only £3 per week to live upon, which was not more than the wages of a prosperous artisan in their great towns. The farms were not being cultivated by capitalist farmers, but by actual working farmers, who kept few servants, and worked along with their sons and labourers. Take the question of language. It was shown by the census that upwards of 500,000 of the Welsh population spoke Welsh exclusively, and that above 500,000 were bi-lingual. Even of those who were bi-lingual, their knowledge of English was so imperfect that they would find very great difficulty indeed in making themselves understood and in transacting business with English people. Consequently a large proportion of the people of Wales, who had no industry but farming, could only earn their living in a district where the Welsh language was spoken, and were precluded from migrating into England or the English-speaking parts of Wales. The result of these factors had been the keen competition for land which was called by the Commissioners land hunger. He did not like the phrase land hunger, and he should prefer terming it the pressure of the population upon the means of subsistence. There was an agricultural population in Wales which, partly in consequence of poverty, and partly in consequence of speaking but the one language, was compelled to work for its living in one restricted area, and the result of that was a keen competition throughout that area. It was impossible that that state of things could exist without undue competition, necessitating some amount of interference. Under these circumstances, the demand for some external authority, which should regulate the relations between landlord and tenant, seemed to him, not only natural on the part of the tenants, but desirable in the interests of the land-owners themselves. He thought a fair test of a Bill of this kind was whether it carried into effect what would be the conditions of a fair agreement between landlord and tenant. Everybody knew that the ordinary English tenancy from year to year, strictly interpreted according to English law, was an absolutely impossible tenure. He thought it was Lord Dufferin who said of it years ago, when dealing with the Irish agitation, that it was a tenure which no Christian man would offer, and no sane man would accept. The only reason why the tenure from year to year had lasted so long as it had, was that it had been modified by custom, and this had in many cases worked fairly well, especially on large estates. But when an estate changed hands, or when they had a landowner who was in pecuniary embarrassment or a despotic character, the custom broke down, the tenure became impossible, and it was then the duty of the Legislature to clothe moral obligations, which had always been recognised, with legal sanction. Recent events in North Wales had shown that this was not an imaginary need. The House would not forget that Lord Penrhyn, besides being a great quarry owner, was also a great landowner. Who would guarantee the Penrhyn tenantry from being treated like the Penrhyn quarrymen if Lord Penrhyn should think his duty required him to do so. The Bill provided for arbitration between landlord and tenant, for the purpose of deciding what rent should be paid by the latter. That principle had been accepted by the minority of the Commissioners. It was scarcely fair, however, to talk about a majority or minority Report in connection with this Commission, because the Report was almost an unanimous one, there being a difference of opinion upon one single point only, namely, whether rent should be settled by arbitration or by conciliation. The nature of the tribunal which it was proposed to constitute had been criticised by hon. Members opposite; but this surely was a question that could be dealt with in Committee. Amendments to the Bill on this point would receive fair consideration. Landowners should note that no difficulty would be placed in the way of their resuming a farm, or part of a farm, when such resumption was desirable in the interests of the community. The provision that the right to a tenancy should descend to a tenant's representatives would simply legalise the practice already prevailing on almost every estate in Wales, and he did not see any reason why this preference should not be given to a tenant's representatives by a legal enactment when it existed already as a matter of fact. They had been told that it would be impossible to fix rents, because there would be no market to establish a standard, but those who took that objection did not take into account the present procedure of valuation. Everybody knew that when a farm was valued a careful estimate was made of the producing power of the land on the one side, and on the other side an estimate was made of the outgoings, including interest on the tenant's capital, his wages of superintendence, and all other expenses. There was every reason to believe that any tribunal that might be set up would take that course in the future, and as the prices of farm produce and the remuneration of bailiffs and farm servants were regulated by the fluctuations of the market, the objection to which he was referring could not be entertained. He knew that the Bill was going to be rejected, but he doubted greatly whether hon. Members were wise in giving a blank refusal to the request of the Welsh Liberal Members. Was it to the interest of the Welsh landlords themselves that they should take up an irreconcilable attitude on this question? He held not, and he thought that they were resting on a broken reed. Let the Welsh landowners who were relying upon the support of the Unionist Party remember what had befallen the Irish landlords. To-day the Irish landlords were almost leading the revolt against the English system of Government because they believed that they had been abandoned by those to whom they had hitherto looked for support. He represented a great agricultural county, and was well acquainted with the views of the Welsh farmers and traders. He knew that they still entertained a warm regard for the great Welsh families, and it would be very difficult to extinguish this feeling in the hearts of the Welsh people; but it would be possible to do so, and an uncompromising rejection of their just demands would be more likely than anything else to effect a change in their present sentiments. He therefore warned the Welsh landlords to be wise in time, and asked them to allow this Bill to pass. He recognised that some of their criticisms were justified, and reminded them that in Committee they would have opportunities of amending the Measure.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. WALTER LONG, Liverpool, West Derby) said that it would not be necessary or possible for him at that hour to trespass very long upon the attention of the House. Hon. Members opposite might have found it difficult to follow the good advice given to them recently by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the South-east Division of Essex as to the length of speeches, but the time at his disposal would oblige him to follow that advice. The hon. Member who had just sat down had appealed to those who opposed this Bill to come to terms with the supporters of the Measure in order that the Welsh landlords might avoid the unhappy fate which had overtaken the Irish landlords. Some very remarkable arguments had been advanced in support of the Second Reading of this Bill, but it had been left to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire to advance the most extraordinary one of all. Did the hon. Member not know that the cause which underlay the whole of the difficulty in Ireland, and which had brought trouble and loss to the landlords without contenting the tenants, was the change made in the law in regard to Irish land in 1881? ["Hear, hear!"] Anyone who attempted now to deal with the Irish land question found that the difficulties in the way had been immensely increased by the departure taken in 1881. Yet those were the circumstances to which the hon. Member pointed to-day to induce the Welsh landlords to come to terms with the promoters of this Bill.

*MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN explained that his object in referring to Ireland was merely to point out that the Welsh landlords might be deserted hereafter by the Unionist Party, and that it might therefore be to their advantage to come to terms now.

*MR. LONG failed to see why the hon. Member had interrupted him, unless it was for the purpose of adding a postscript to his speech. He ventured to think that the hon. Member had not improved his position by his interruption. The Bill before them had been recommended to the House on two grounds, the first being that Wales occupied a distinct position. They had been told of the land hunger in Wales and of a Welsh-speaking race who could earn a living nowhere except in their own country, and who were naturally disinclined to leave it. The speeches of the Mover and Seconder of the Bill had been couched in terms of great courtesy and fairness, and he took note with satisfaction of this alteration in the tone of hon. Members opposite who advocated the cause of the tenants as against the Welsh landlords. The case against the landlords had not always been put so moderately and fairly. He hoped, therefore, that it was the intention of hon. Members opposite and of their friends in the country, who supported the cause of extreme land reform, to cease making attacks upon the Welsh landlords as a class, and that the House had heard the last of accusations for which there was no justification in the evidence given before the Royal Commission. ["Hear, hear!"] If the value of the labours of the Commission was to be judged by the length of its Report, its value must be great indeed, for the Report covered nearly a thousand pages. He admitted that there was a great deal in it that was very interesting. He did not pretend to have read the whole of it, but he had read a great deal, and he hoped to read it all in time. [Laughter.] The Report was certainly instructive, if regarded as a general history of Wales and its people. But he had not found that assistance which he expected to find in the Report of the Commission, which he understood was specially appointed to inquire into the land question in Wales. That report, he supposed, was to be taken as the foundation of this Bill. The supporters of the Measure urged that the case of Wales was so different from the case of England that separate treatment was necessary. It had been alleged that the report of the minority justified the contention that separate legislation was necessary for Wales. He declined to accept that description of the minority Report. His hon. Friend the Member for Swansea and those who thought with him had stated that any alteration which might be deemed to be necessary could be and ought to be effected by an Amendment in the Agricultural Holdings Act, and they only advocated separate legislation for Wales in the absence of a general Measure of that nature such as had been promised for England and Wales. There was, moreover, a fallacy underlying this proposition of separate treatment, because it was very well known that hon. Members who had supported this Bill would be just as ready to aid a similar Bill for England. A proportion of the people in Wales it was true spoke only the Welsh language. That, no doubt, was an obstacle in the way of their going from home and seeking a livelihood; but no argument had been advanced, either as to the competition for farms in the pastoral districts, love of home, or a desire to remain in their districts, which supported the Welsh claim and which did not find an echo among Englishmen who were conversant with similar facts in relation to England. While hon. Gentlemen from Wales had been eloquent as to the sufferings of the Welsh tenant, and had told the House a great deal about the undue renting of Welsh agriculturists and their difficulties, they had not said a word why it was that they believed this proposal of theirs was going to prove a sovereign remedy for Welsh difficulties. A great deal had been said as to the position of agriculturists in Ireland, where legislation of this kind had existed for many years; but it had been shown in evidence that though the Irish Land Courts fixed fair rents the decrease of rent in Ireland had not been so great under the system of Land Court reduction as it had been in England through the voluntary action of the landlord. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen ignored the fact that what was wanted was to improve the condition of the agricultural tenant, in order to make him better able to compete with his difficulties. It was admitted in the Report of the Commission that there was no real cause of complaint in Wales on the score of absenteeism, lack of equipment of farms, or unreadiness on the part of the landlords to provide the necessary buildings. Did hon. Members believe that they could take away from the landlord all right of dealing with his property and his tenant while at the same time expect the landlord to continue the work he had been carrying out for years in connection with his property?

He was convinced that if they wanted to benefit the tenant farmer the end would not be attained by introducing this outside system and by bringing in a third party in connection with the fixing of a fair rent. The present system of land tenure was not only ancient, but it had conferred great benefits on society and on agriculture, and the charges brought against the system were very few indeed. It had, on the whole, worked fairly as between class and class; under it this country had attained a position in connection with agriculture and its processes which no other country in the world had reached. The House ought not, therefore, in a moment, and without greater reason and justification being shown than were contained in the speeches of the supporters of the Bill or in the Report, to interfere with so ancient a system of land tenure. As the representative of the Government he asked the House to reject the Bill in such a way as to show how decided its opinion was. [Cheers.]
